"There is something in Dr. Newman's manner of even approaching a subject characteristic of the peculiarities of his mind. He seems to labour under a kind of intellectual squint. Partly from nature and partly from inveterate habit, he seems incapable of taking a straightforward view of anything. The mind's eye glances off at once from a direct survey to the sides of whatever he contemplates, and, losing sight of all that is most obvious to others, lights on some collateral bearing, some chance relation to accidental circumstance, and fastens there. The sinister power of discovering, and readiness to selze, the wrong handle of everything is, curiously enough, what gives him with many his great reputation for depth of thought; just as if a man should gain the character of a great navigator by going from this [Dublin] to Holyhead by the Cape of Good Hope instead of taking the direct course."—Rightfory.

REV. WILLIAM FITZGERALD: Lectures on Ecclesiastical History.

"The one object to which he has devoted the labours of a lifetime has been the formation of his religious creed. He has exercised an influence more powerful over the thoughts of his generation on such subjects than almost any other living man. He is regarded by many people as an incarnation of what is called 'remorseless logic': and yet, after careful and prolonged study of all his principal writings, we find it impossible to understand what is the foundation of his whole structure. From first to last he never, so far as we know gives any clear account of the reasons why he should hold with this desperate tenacity to the opinions which appear to lead to results which appear so strange. The question forces itself on a reader of the 'Apologia' at every page of that work, but it contains almost nothing to gratify his curiosity."—Sal. Rev., xix. 768.

"His was not the writer's nature that is irresistibly im-of the 'Apologia' at every page of that work, but it contains almost nothing to gratify his curiosity."—Sol. Rev., xix. 768.

"His was not the writer's nature that is irresistibly impelled to writing and thinking for their own sakes. He thought, he wrote, that he might influence the actions of men. He did influence their actions, but, as a consequence, most of what he wrote has in reality died away with its practical eflect, and of his forty volumes but a few sermons, 'Lead, kindly Light,'—the one hymn of our language,—the 'Apologia, and perhaps 'The Idea of a University,' will form permanent additions to English literature. His histories are unhistorical, his criticism uncritical, and much of his theology is founded on his history and criticism. ... And yet what literary powers were those that thus seem to have been squandered away on temporary objects! ... All the resources of a master of English style—except, perhaps, one, description—were at his command; pure diction, clear arrangement, frony, dignity, a copious command of words combined with a reserve in the use of them,—all these qualities went to make up the charm of Newman's style, the finest flower that the earlier system of a purely classical education has produced."—Ath., No. 327.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

General Criticism:

"The Hon. Roden Noel, as a poet, has never received the attention he deserves. This is not altogether the fault of the English public. Mr. Noel's poems are not exactly such as he who runs may read. To be appreciated they require patient study, not only because their thought is often abstruse, but also because their expression is not unfrequently perplexing. Indeed, no other poet of our age, with the exception of Mr. Robert Browning, has added so much of verbal and rhythmical difficulty to the difficulties of pregnant meaning and bold speculation. . . . It is probable that his poems will not receive due recognition until a Noel Society has been founded. Then people will discover that an impassioned singer, a philosopher of marked originality, a tender-hearted Christian, and a democrat in the noblest sense of that term, has been appealing to them in words of wayward beauty and varied melody during more than a quarter of a century, almost unheeded."

Norgate, Miss Kate. England under the Angevin Kings. Maps and Plans. Lon., 1887, 2 vols. 8vo. "Certainly these volumes form a faithful analysis of all the chronicles bearing on the period; and when we consider the sheer bulk of the materials, it is not surprising that the work should have needed, as Miss Norgate intimates, the labour of eleven years. . . . Not only does Miss Norgate present us with no new views, but she passionately rejects the humblest offers of new lights. We thus get, as regards the matin subject, the old story, though we are bound to say that here and there occur clever solutions of isolated difficulties. . . . Her volumes will form a necessary part of every historical library."—Richard Howlett. Acad., XXXII. 312.

"Her book is emphatically scholarly; she has a clear sight and a strong grasp of things, and she is not carried away by fancies. . . She is always at her very best in Anjou and the other lands of the counts of Anjou; she is not, as a rule, at her very best in England, neither is she at her very best in Aquitaine. . . . Her treatment of Anjou and the Angevins is all alive: in Aquitaine it gets comparatively cold and dead."—E. A. FREEMAN: Historical Review, No. 8.

2. Tonkin; or, France in the Far East: with Maps, Lon., 1884, 8vo.

"Capt. Norman's book is an opportune contribution to the literature of this question, beginning as it does with the early relations between France and Tonquin, before the French Revolution, and continuing the narrative of the present war down to the most recent operations.

His main purpose, however, is to... urge the danger which the conduct and present temper of the French bode to England and to civilization generally. He does not strengthen his case by the violently anti-French tone which pervades his book."—Ath., No. 2940.

1883. 3. Matrimony, Lon., 1881, 3 vols. cr. 8vo; new ed., 1883.

"" Matrimony' has almost all the qualities that make a good novel,—that is, a good man's novel. We have not at all the same confidence in recommending the book to ladies. Mr. Norris is a student of Thackeray, whose works ladies, as a rule, dislike. ... Mr. Norris has even adopted a part of Thackeray's method, and here we begin to find fault. It is not everybody who can employ that method. ... The book is wonderfully rich in types of character. Even the young heroes have an individuality of their own which is rare. ... Mr. Norris is at home in many varieties of life: his Frenchmen, men of letters, gamblers, and scoundrels, his barbarous Russian general, are almost as good as his rowdy, ill-tempered young lords and gossiping admirals and prosy Spencerian philosopher."—Sal. Rev., ll. 277.

"He has written a good novel, as novels go, with some life-like description in it, and much entertaining dialogue, and one or two life-like side characters, . . and among them all he has placed Tito—Philip Marescalchi—and so guided him that the reader, even if he has absorbed 'Romola,' feels no sense of failure in the portrait. . . . Mr. Norris has the art of analyzing character in a high degree, and, after all, that is the novelist's first need. 'No New Thing' is full of very human people, of whom only one is certainly a caricature.'—Spectator, lvi. 614.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"It is a considerable pleasure, in these days of over-refinement and subtle delicacy, to find a new novelist who looks at the world simply from a man of the world's point of view, and does not care to conceal the fact. He 'knows his world,' which is a pretty extensive one, and includes among its inhabitants not only English people of all classes and conditions, but a considerable variety of Continental types as well; and, above all, he has a knowledge of the human heart and a capacity for analyzing its processes which is, to say the least, of great utility to a writer of fiction."—Nation, xxxiii. 138.

"His presentment of life is veracious and sober, his environment is clearly, often brilliantly, delineated, his characters are persuasively human and unheroic."—Sal. Rev., lxii. 524.

Oliphant, who was chief justice there; was called to the bar, but devoted his energies largely to travel; served on Lord Elgin's mission to China 1857-59, and in 1861 was appointed charge d'affaircs at Yedo, where he was attacked by assassins and so severely wounded that he was obliged to resign the appointment. He was member of Parliament for the Stirling Burghs 1865-68, when he resigned his seat, and, having some time previously come under the influence of Thomas Lake Harris, supra, removed to the United States to join the spiritual-istic community established in Dutchess Co., N.Y., ac-companied by his mother, Lady Oliphant, who shared He handed over his fortune to the community and lived there for about eighteen months, working on the farm and as peddler and teamster. In 1870 he went as correspondent of the London Times to the Franco-Prussian war, and some years later, after an unsuccessful attempt to establish a colony of Jews in Palestine, he founded three religious colonies in that country, at one of which, near the town of Haifa, he took up his residence. In 1888 he made a visit to the United States, and on his return was taken ill and died a few months later. 1. It is a field in which Mr. Oliphant's imagination runs riot to an excess which I at least have never seen surpassed.... He explores the world of spirits with a self-assurance which no materialist investigating the laws of matter could possibly rival."—John Owen: Acad., xxxiv. 81.

"When Mr. Laurence Oliphant tells us that an atomic union has taken place between the inmost principle of his spiritual life and that of other beings no longer living on this side of the grave, and that it is by virtue of such atomic interlockings that the great redeeming force is to be constituted by which the victory over the growing evils of the world is to be gained, what can we say, except that we are very glad to hear that such active preparations for the coming conflict are going on, but that, as they rest on evidence for the existence of which we have only his own word, without anything to confirm it in the range of our own experience, we are not able to exult with any of the confidence which betrays itself in his language?... We may add that a great deal of Mr. Oliphant's criticism on the limitations of the inspired writings is very clear and just."—Spectator, Ixi. 787.

"Her book is far too long; her style is far too wordy; and she follows far too readily, and with a fatal facility, in the wake of the modern sensation-biographers. . . Nevertheless, it cannot be merely from the nature of her subject that she has been enabled to produce a truly interesting and most affecting memoir. The book is written with a genuine enthusiasm that redeems its affectations. The great service she has done to the object of her admiration is in producing more than one series of his letters to his wife, which must forever place his thorough earnestness and simplicity beyond cavil. . . With the materials now set before us, Irving's life ought to have a niche in every gallery of religious biography; and, notwithstanding all his defects and errors, there are few lives of the saints that will be fuller of instruction, interest, and contemplation."

"Rumour—we do not know how correctly—attributes this remarkable work to the pen of the authoress of the 'Life of Irving.' At any rate, this story, full of grace and originality, has many of the same merits that characterized the biography. There is also a general resemblance between the career of the hero and that of Irving, which can scarcely be accidental. The pictures of the minister and his friends. . . are so vivid, and sketched with so much himour, and so keen a sense both of the Indicrous and the pathetic, that the early part of the story, at least, might be considered quite worthy of the authoress of 'Adam Bede.' . . There is throughout the book the same delicacy, refinement, and facility of expression which lent so great a charm to the 'Life of Irving.' There is, too, the same spirit of justice and toleration."—Sat. Rev., xv. 210.

Montalembert, Peer of France, Deputy for the Department of Doubs: a Chapter of Recent French History, Lon., 1872, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"As we read Mrs. Oliphant's volumes we miss Montalembert as his friends knew him,—astute, impetuous, sarcastic; quick to get into his opinions and very slow to get out of them again: with a Gladstonian power of making the whole world for the time being run upon one consideration, and a power of ready speech Gladstonian in its volume, but not in its epigram, and (as suited the son of a Frenchman and an Englishwoman) equally ready in both languages to prove that this one thing was the whole world; but, behind all these salient manifestations, possessed of a unity of purpose which sooner or later was sure to fix the more volatile attributes of the external man... The reader of Mrs. Oliphant's book would almost as little have imagined that Montalembert was systematically a prime master of sublime banter as that genius and not physical comeliness marked his appearance... We could almost suspect that, as her literary correspondence with him preceded any personal acquaintance, she must have constructed an ideal Montalembert of troubadour aspect, which always maintained a successful rivary in her mind's eye with the more characteristic reality."—Sol. The title sounds well, but it is not accurate. The men whom Mrs. Oliphant has written about did not make Florence, but found the city existing already in the most vigorous life. . . . The book is divided into three 1191 main parts, one treating of Dante, another of the Cathedral-Builders, and the third of the Monks of San Marco. It concludes with a chapter on Michael Angelo. . . Oliphant, Thomas J. Digest of Decisions of the Arkansas Supreme Court, 1861–1886, Little Rock, 1886, Svo.

Oliphant, Thomas Laurence Kington -. M.A., F.S.A., b. 1831, at Henlease, near Bristol, Eng.; educated at Eton, and at Balliol College, Oxford; called to the bar at the Inner Temple 1858; assumed the additional surname of Oliphant on succeeding to the estate of his maternal grandfather in Perthshire in 1864. History of Frederick the Second, Emperor of the Romans: from Chronicles and Documents published within the Last Ten Years, Lon., 1862, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The merits of Mr. Kington's book are real and sterling; the faults are such as years and experience will soon lead him to amend."—Sol. Rev., xiv. 712.

2. The Jacobite Lairds of Gask, (Grampian Club

Pub.,) Lon., 1870, 8vo. 3. The Sources of Standard English, Lon., 1873, 12mo.

"He has thought and studied under the guidance of the best recent writers... The characteristic feature of the book is that it gives the results of their researches and of Mr. Oliphant's own in the form of a narrative, not of a grammar or discussion on grammar."—Sal. Rev., xxxvii. 57.

"Mr. Oliphant has done good service in bringing together and making easily accessible so much of this hitherto rare learning. . . The early part of the book is disfigured for American and German readers by its use of Rask's classifications of the early inflections, which have been long known to be all wrong."—Nation, xviii. 269.

4. The Duke and the Scholar, and other Essays, Lon, 1875.

"He has embodied in it . . . all that he thought worth preserving in his former volume on the 'Sources of Standard English' and to this earlier matter he has made large additions, throwing the whole into a form which will make the work, when complete, the best history of our language."—Sat. Rev., xlvii. 625.

6. The New English, Lon., 1886, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"The new volumes have very little of the literary effects."

language."—Sat. Rev., xivii. ozo.

6. The New English, Lon., 1886, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

"The new volumes have very little of the literary attractiveness which characterized their predecessor. Instead of attempting to write a readable book, Mr. Oliphant has been content with producing the most valuable collection of materials for the lexical history of the English language that has hitherto been published. . . The present work consists essentially of an analysis of the vocabulary, not, indeed, of every important writer or book, but of a continuous series of representative books from the beginning of the fourteenth to the beginning of the fourteenth to the beginning of the fourteenth to the beginning of the fourteenth.

Oppert, Ernest, a native of North Germany. A Forbidden Land: Voyages to the Corea: with an Account of its Geography, History, Productions, Commercial Capabilities, &c. Illust. and Charts. N. York and Lon., 1880, 8vo.

"The author ... is the same whom Mr. Seward accuses of having engaged in a body-snatching voyage to Corea. ... He ... coolly and without denial tells us that the main object of his voyage was to steal some burled relics held in great veneration by the regent of this peninsular kingdom, ... and to make commercial intercourse the sine qud non of the return of the stolen bones, corpses, ancestral tablets, or heirlooms. ... Mr. Oppert has recorded his adventures and observations in a style that savors at times of Hans Brettman, of country newspapers, and of the British slang at China ports."—Nation. xxx. 271. "His knowledge of the people and country is in a measure derived from personal experience gained during his three trips to the country, during which, though not admitted to any large town, he took several long walks in the interior, and visited many villages on the islands, the coast of the mainland, and on the banks of the Kang-Kiang, the large river leading to the capital (Saoul) and discovered by him."—Acad., xvii. 40.

Osborn, Lieut.-Col. Robert Durie, of the 1197

Bengal Staff Corps, d. 1889; went to India just before the Mutiny; served till after the Afghan campaign of 1879, but retired as soon as the treaty of Gundamuk had been signed, "feeling himself unable to go through the horrors of the second campaign, which he considered the norrors of the second campaign, which he considered to be inevitable, in furtherance of a policy that, in his unofficial capacity, he strongly condemned." He was a proficient at lawn tennis, and died while playing against James E. Renshaw, the "champion of all England." He was a frequent contributor to magazines and news-papers, and published in India some translations of Oriental poetry. 1. Islam under the Arabs, Lon., 1876, Owen, Robert Dale, LL.D., [ante, vol. ii., add.,] 1800-1877. During the civil war he took an active part in advocating the emancipation of the slaves, and published letters to the President and members of the cabinet which are said to have had much effect in their delibertions on the subject. Throughout the latter part of ations on the subject. Throughout the latter part of his life he was a believer in spiritualism and prominent among its supporters. 1. "Upon the question, On what basis of fact do the alleged spiritual manifestations rest? Mr. Owen has a better right to be patiently heard than many, even than most, other writers who have discussed it. A more dispassionate mind, a more laborious observation, has seldom been brought to the study of the question."—Nation, xv. 269.

"It is a series of Black Classics, wherein the color is an accident, the soul human and universal. All that Mr. Page had to do—and he has done it well—was to be a faithful 'recording angel,' to open a sympathetic and retentive ear, to reproduce in firm outlines what every-day life in Virginia abundantly provides, and to clothe the whole in a humorous dialect which is to the psychology what the salt is to the soup."—Critic, viii. 14.

"So well has the mass of material been assimilated that the result, far from being a series of heavy papers redolent of the musty tomes from which they have been gathered, has evolved itself, . . . for the most part, into a number of charming sketches touched in with the light and sure hand of a master."—Spectator. | xi. 361.

5. Euphorion: being Studies of the Antique and the Mediæval in the Renaissance, Lon., 1884, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Its merit is that it is not the compilation of laborious learning, but the direct utterance of an individual mind. Its faults lie in the incessant and undue assertion of this individuality, in confusing impressions with ideas, in a wanton riot of needlessly strong language, and in a harassing and vexatious attempt to overwhelm us with tumultuous description... Vernon Lee has drawn her knowledge of the Italian Renaissance from direct personal contact with its memorials, and her power of sympathetic interpretation has been admirably true. But she has not enjoyed the same advantages in regard to feudalism and asceticism which she is perpetually bringing into comparison with the Renaissance... When she writes about Italian art she is always suggestive and often convincing. When she indulges in historical generalizations she is wayward and even childish."—Sat. Rev., Iviii. 317.

Bits of downright slang are thrust into sentences which are otherwise rather highflown. 7. Miss Brown: a Novel, Lon., 1884, 3 vols. cr. 8vo.

"'Miss Brown's not only a vivid picture of human life, but also both a severe satire and a tragedy. The subject of the satire is the falseness of the sethetic ideal, and the tendency of its worshippers to gravitate towards the prossest immorality, while that of the tragedy is the sacrifice, to put it shortly, of a noble character on the altar of gratitude. The difficult themes are treated with great brilliance and originality, and with a literary and imaginative force which demand recognition. It is only to be regretted that both tragedy and satire are extremely and needlessly painful and unpleasant."—Acad., xxvii. 6.

"She is gifted with a large range of interests, a strong desire to see things clearly, and an uncommon turn for exposition, and is also gifted—if we should not rather say handicapped—with an inclination to write upon all sorts of subjects, and a great belief in the power of words to enlighten the hidden recesses of thought. Fluent by nature, she is in danger of becoming voluble by habit... We read the book on and on with continual respect and even admiration for the writer's acuteness, sincerity, and independence of thought, and for her faculty of putting forcibly what she has to say; but it cannot be asserted that the perusal is either delightful in process or wholly satisfactory in result."—Ath., No. 3059.

"The essays relate to a theme—that of fine art—which she now regards as more fitted for youthful readers and students than for those of riper years... However this may be she applies herself with her usual earnestness to the debating of various questions of fine art, and treats them in her accustomed method,—trenchant reasoning, candid, if at times extreme, and brilliant description having a somewhat 'impressionist' bias, especially where items of colour effect are concerned."—Ath., No. 3119.

"She is at once subtle and audacious, engagingly frank in proclaiming her likes and dislikes, agreeably discursive, though never wantonly irrelevant, ... and, finally, able to express her meaning with a literary ease, a wealth of imagery, and a refinement rather than polish of style, which render the perusal of her works an intellectual luxury of a high order."—Specialor, ix. 143.

F. Tyrwhitt Drake, he undertook for the Palestine Exploration Fund an exploration of the great Desert of the Wanderings. In 1871 he was appointed Lord Almoner's reader and professor of Arabic at Cambridge University. He resigned that post in 1871 to become a journalist on the staff of the London Standard and contributor to the Saturday Review and other papers. In 1882 he was sent by the Admiralty on a mission to Jaffa and the Desert of Suez to secure the neutrality of the sheiks of the tribes along the canal. Having been successful in this, he was appointed chief interpreter to the forces, and was proceeding to Nakhl to an interview with some Arab sheiks, when he was attacked by a party of hostile Bedouins and lost his life. His remains, with those of his two companions, Captain Gill, R.E.. and Lieutenant Charrington, R.N., were taken to England and buried in St. Paul's Cathedral. For biog., see Berann, Walter, supra. 1. "Captain Parker's story is delightfully told... The sensation that one gets in reading his book is like that of going out in a yacht on a fine morning, with a spanking breeze... The narrative, from the first appearance of the boy of fourteen on the deck of the 'North Carolina' to the parting at Abbeville after the collapse of the Confederacy, is steadily pursued, and the facts are told in a manly and straightforward way... It is particularly in that part of the book which deals with the civil war that one is struck by the impartial candor of its criticism."—Nation, xxxvii. 355.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"If we except Washington Irving and Prescott, there is no United States writer who shows greater skill than Mr. Parkman in giving full value to his researches. . . . Even Motley, though a writer of remarkable talent, is not, on the whole, so great a master of his pen as Mr. Parkman. Indeed, the latter pleases both by what he says and by the impression which he leaves of saying less than he might say, and by avoiding alike undue emphasis and artificial exaggeration."—Ath., No. 2619.

2. The War of the Succession in Spain during the Reign of Queen Anne, 1702–1711: based on Original Unpublished MSS. and Contemporary Records: with Map, Lon., 1888, 8vo.

"Col. Parnell has brought into clear relief parts of the contest before unnoticed; he has thrown fresh light on its better-known passages; and he has woven his copious store of facts into a work which, if not free from defects, has the great merits of research and freshness. His judgments, too, upon men and things are, for the most part, impartial and true; and he has, we think, completely exploded the undeserved estimate made of Peterborough and Rooke, while he has done justice to the military skill and heroism of the great Huguenot, Galway. On the other hand, he has failed to combine his narrative into a dramatic whole. It is too much a series of detached scenes; and we cannot agree with his judgment on Berwick,—a really great chief, whose remarkable exploits he endeavours throughout the book to depreciate."—W. O'CONNOE MORRIS: Acad, Xxxiii. 319.

"A very charming love-tale... It is difficult to decide whether the palm of interest is to be awarded to the very amusing sketch of the shifty lady of fashion, with her misplaced pride cropping out on one occasion and her utter want of self-respect when wealth is to be secured on another; or to the no less excellent view afforded of the intolerance of some forms of Protestant dissent, and of the bad effects which religious formalism and social isolation produce on the formation of character."—Ath., No.

He contributed many articles to Grove's Dictionary of Music. Studies of Great Composers: with Portraits, Lon., 1886, p. 8vo. (Contains short biographies, with introductory remarks to each section.)

remarks to each section.)

"The composers of whom the author treats are eleven in number,—Palestrina, Handel, Bach. Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven. Weber, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Wagner... Dr. Parry possesses the power of grasping clearly in his own mind and bringing plainly before his readers the salient points of a composer's style, and the difference between the method adopted by one and that which is natural to another... He is extremely catholic in his sympathies: he writes with equal admiration of the grand simplicity of Handel and of the elaborate combinations of Wagner."—Ath., No. 3096.

"Every reader of Lord Macaulay's essays knows something of Dorothy Osborne; but we have to thank Mr. Parry, and still more the owner of Dorothy's love-letters, for enabling us to form an intimate acquaintance with the charming woman through the long years of Sir William Temple's courtship. . . The editor of this fascinating volume has done his part with judgment, and with full appreciation of his heroine's excellences. Pater, Walter Horatio, b. 1839, in London; educated at the King's School, Canterbury, and at Queen's College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1862; elected Fellow of Brasenose, in which college he has since held various offices. He has spent much time in Italy, France, nounced the Renaissance as hollow and unholy, a singular change has come over the younger generation who are now in turn moulding the literature and the art of the country. Poetry, painting, and criticism alike—the poetry and pictures of Mr. Rossetti, the poetry of Mr. Swinburne, not to mention a host of imitators, the paintings of Mr. Burne Jones, together with divers critical writings such as the work now before us—all tell of a modern renaissance of the old Renaissance, of a new life sometimes surrendered to passion and to pleasure, but in its better aspects aspiring through the ministration of the arts to conditions of high mental enjoyment and pure asthetic culture.

Mr. Pater, following in the wake of certain French writers, has discovered a præ-Renaissance,—to use his own words, a Renaissance within the limits of the middle age itself, a brilliant, but in part abortive, effort to do for human life and the human mind, at the end of the twelfth and the beginning of the thirteenth century, 'what was afterwards done in the fifteenth'.

The disquisition on Leonardo da Vinci will be read even by those who are versed in the whole library that has grown out of the most fertile of themes in the Italian revival. Subtle and searching insight is shown in that part of the artis's career which lies on the frontier of the natural and the supernatural, which touched on divination, 'clairvoyance,' the alchemist's secret, with the strange approaches in animal creation to phases in humanity.

The last paragraph in the book carries the inquiry to a consummation; it points to the beall and the end-all of every phase of art. past, present, and to come. The moral taught seems to be that life is short, but that art can make it long; that the wisest men give themselves to art and song, and thus get as many pulsations as possible into the allotted time. Art comes 'professing frankly to give nothing but the highest quality to your moments as they pass, and simply for those moments sake.'"—Sul. Rev., xxxvi. 123.

"The mental history of a young man whose chief interest in life is the consideration and solution of questions about life and how to live it well. . . . A more 'subjective' book could scarcely be written; yet the pictures of ancient life and old aspects of Italy which it contains are numerous and beautiful enough to attract even readers who do not hanker after mysticism. . . The air of the work, the atmosphere through which we see the pictures pass and succeed each other, is chill and clear, like some silver dawn of summer breaking on secular olive gardens, cold distant hills, and cities built of ancient marbles."—Sat. "The distiluctive merit and characteristic of the whole book will be missed if the reader does not appreciate what the author has evidently tried to do. He must not consider himself as listening to a tale-teller, but as watching an artist gradually adding stroke to stroke, and producing, not so much a successive effect, as in narration, but a combined and total impression, as in drawing."—Sat. GENERAL CRITICISM :

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"There is no living writer who excels Mr. Pater in grace of style. He does not indulge in passages of sustained eloquence, but every word he writes is calculated to be the best word in that place, to have its full signification brought out. Here and there, of course, there are passages of exceptional beauty; but, line as these are, Mr. Pater's special faculty for verbal expression is more noticeable in his occasional use of certain words which in his mouth, so to speak, act like a charm. While he is the music of the viola rather than of the violin."—Ath., No. 2992.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"So admirable an artist has rarely been content to do so little with his art; so brilliant and pungent a thinker has perhaps never been content so long to dwell on the very border-land of insipidity. Born with a gift which we believe would have enabled him to adorn a wide circle of themes, he has almost obstinately confined himself to the embroidery of one. Dowered with a rare ear for metrical effects, educated in all the niceties of metrical science, he has of set purpose chosen the most sing-song of English metres as the almost exclusive vehicle of his ideas. The laureate of the tea-table, with his humdrum stories of girls that smell of bread and butter, is in his inmost heart the most arrogant and visionary of mystics. There is no figure more interesting or more difficult to analyze on the poetic stage of our generation."—Ath., No. 3659.

"Last night I read the new Poem, (First part of 'Victories of Love,') I can truly say, with a great deal of pleasure;—and as you know my aversion to that form of composition when not inexorably necessary, and with what horror I avoid the things commonly called 'Poems,' you may fairly take to yourself a very considerable credit out of that fact alone! The question whether it had not been better that a man of your powers had trained himself to prow, as exquisitely as you have to verse, and stood by the vigorous fact as the gods have unalterably made it, instead of floating in this light, beautiful way, rods and nilles above it; the question whether, even in verse itself, with this admirable power of execution, you should not now take some more robust class of subjects, and close the Tronsoluour Enterprise as well finished, these and other questions are still open with me. . . There is a great deal of talent in this book; the execution of it nearly perfect; and the sentiments and doctrines set forth in it generally exalted and noble:—what a pity they went soaring miles above the rugged, contradictory facts, instead of standing anild them, tollsomely constraining them into melody."—

Pattison, Rev. Mark, M.A., B.D., 1813-1884, b. at Hornby, Yorkshire: graduated at Oriel College, Oxford, 1837; Fellow of Lincoln College 1840-61, tutor 1843 54; ordained 1840; rector of Lincoln College from 1861 till his death. He was intimate with the leaders of the Tractarian movement, and took part in their translation of the Fathers, but subsequently adopted liberal views in regard to theological questions, and was one of the writers of "Essays and Reviews." His life was chiefly devoted to study, but at one period he took an active interest in university reform, and spent some time in investigating the condition and methods of the German universities. While at Berlin in 1858 he acted as correspondent of the Times, and during his later life he was a frequent contributor to the Quarterly Review, the Nineteenth Century, and other periodicals. 1. "It is needless to say that Mr. Pattison's work is based throughout on the best materials, that a variety of documents hitherto unprinted have been consulted, and that the story gains much in vividness as well as in fidelity through the conscientious use of the original data. We conceive that, as a picture of literary life in the sixteenth century, the present biography is without a rival."—Ath., No. 2468.

"This little work, full without overflowing its fixed limits, and of real value as a fresh and vigorous criticism, has the peculiar charm of its author's favourite ironical manner."—Sat. Rev., xlix. 186.

"When he deals with Milton as a poet the reader who loves his Milton feels that his only becoming attitude is that of a listening disciple at the foot of a master. . . . "The interest attaching to this volume has been heightened by the recent revelation of the preacher's character as he himself depicted it in his "Memoirs;" and readers who have been repelled by the traces of the petty jealousy and morbid self-consciousness which he determined to put on record, and have been tempted to take him at his own valuation, will be surprised by the earnestness of thought and real depth of feeling which characterize these pages."—Ath., No. 3034.

Fall of Constantinople: being the Story of the Fourth Crusade, Lon., 1885, 8vo.

"The main thesis of Mr. Pears' book is that the irruption of the Ottoman Turks Into Eastern Europe was entirely due to the crushing blow inflicted on the Byzanfine empire by the fourth crusade, all other causes which led up to that irruption being of very secondary importance... Differing from Mr. Pears on his main thesis, we are yet bound to do him justice by pointing out the many merits of his work. It has not been put together at second-hand, but shows a wide knowledge of the original authorities of the period, both eastern and western. Its style is agreeable, and even vigorous. Moreover, a residence of some years in Constantinople has enabled the author to describe scenes and localities with a freedom and picturesque thoroughness which only the eye-witness can possess."—C. "The period . . . is one which invites study, and Mr. Pearson has studied it carefully. We see all through his book that it has not been compiled from current histories, with occasional verifications from original sources, but that it is the work of one who has made himself familiar with the contemporary authorities, so that he has the right and the power to form independent views as to the events which he relates."—Spectator, xlix. 1347.

"Like previous works of the late lamented historian of the arts of Tuscany, this exhaustive monograph, on one of the most original of the Renaissance artists, is rather to be noted for its patient and thorough research, its compendious assimilation of the art studies of other authorities, and its catholic appreciation, than for critical acumen or originality."—Nation, xiiv, 81.

"We have very little but praise for the work before us.

About a third of the work is given to Richelieu; about a third of the work is given to Richelieu; about a third ... to the Fronde; and three chapters at the end are of a general nature, upon the administration, society, and religion. The reader lays aside the book with a higher estimate of Mazarin's ability and character,"—

"Mr. Perkins combines an industry worthy of his subject with a remarkable power of presenting the results of his labours in an attractive form. He has a thorough acquaintance with the works of the memoir-writers and letter-writers of his period; he has consulted State papers of all kinds, both printed and in manuscript. ... Though he adorns his book with the vivacity, personal interest, and picturesque descriptions that are characteristic of the literature of the day, he bises his history on authorities that stand apart from the influence of spite or other selfish motives."—Sal. "The 'Life of St. Hugh,' which is its ostensible subject, takes up less than half the volume, more than one hundred and seventy pages of which are devoted to the history of the establishment of the see of Lincoln, and to biographies of its first occupants, together with sketches of the monarchs and clergy of St. Hugh's time. . . Canon Perry has successfully brought out the leading traits of Hugh's very remarkable character in his well-written narrative. Perhaps it is as well that he has not attempted any general summary of his life. Mr. Dimock's portrait of this holy and courageous bishop is too powerfully drawn to be easily surpassed."—Sat. "There seems to us to be, here and there, too much esthetic consciousness and effort in these poems, here and there a little poor and conventional trilling, and now and then a false note, due to the intellectual will-work with which Mrs. Pfelfter allows herself to interrupt her poetic mood... But there is a great weight of truly-blended thought and feeling in many of the poems; and in not a few of the sonnets, where the thought and feeling are so closely intertwined that it is impossible to separate one from the other, there are flights of true imagination of which, to our mind, almost the greatest of English sonnetwriters might, and possibly would, have been proud."—

"The instinct of the masses is at one with the foremost of statesmen in believing that the depopulation of our villages, the overcrowding of our towns, the poverty and dependence of our labourers, may be ameliorated by legislation which shall bring together the waste now craving the spade and the spade ever longing for the waste. To amass relevant facts and to recount tested experiences in this direction, is the object of Mr. Phillips's comprehensive book. It traces the development of land-tenure amongst the Egyptians, Hebrews, Greeks, Romans, in the Middle Ages, in modern Europe, and in America. It narrates with special minuteness the agrarian history of England; the change from allodial to fendal holdings; the story of the manor and the villein, of the free labourer and the hired artisan; the beginnings of primogeniture and entail, of rent, taxation, pauperism, public debt; dissecting finally, in a frankly judicial spirit, the remedial proposals of Giffen and Mallock on the one hand, of George and Wallace on the other."—Spectator, lix. 11:22.

Phipson, Miss Emma. The Animal-Lore of Shakespeare's Time: including Quadrupeds, Birds, Reptiles, Fish, and Insects, Lon., 1883, p. 8vo.

"This is, of its kind, a singularly interesting and curlous book. Miss Phipson's aim has been to supply an account of the way in which Shakspeare and his contemporaries regarded the animal world, and she illustrates the subject with quotations taken from their writings."—Ath., No. 2927.

"While all the animals... mentioned by Shakspere are brought together, the cages, ponds, and dens are made to receive such others as were known in his time, although not found in his collection. The idea is very apt, and we may congratulate the author on the happy way in which she has carried out her plan."—Acad., xxiv. 250.

"Before its appearance absolutely nothing was known of its subject beyond the mention of his name in Savage's 'Genealogical Dictionary,' and the scant indexes of Colonial Records. . . . Yet here he is in these pages, the real man; intense but never narrow; grim and stiff-necked and high-handed, but bold and strong, and free and true."

"If no one can gossip more pleasantly, certainly few have a better right to gossip.... Mr. Planché comes before the public in four distinct characters. First, he is an accomplished man of the world, seventy-six years of age, who from youth has been familiar with the stage and mixed with the best literary and theatrical society. Secondly, he has been one of the most prolific dramatists of his day, having originated a species of drama with respect to which he has remained altogether without a rival. Thirdly, he is a distinguished archeologist... Fourthly, he has held for nearly twenty years the rank of Rouge Croix Poursulvant in the Heralds' College, and has consequently paid official visits to foreign courts when some potentate has been invested with the Orderof the Garter... So many and so good are the anecdotes he relates that two or three could not be taken from the rest by any process more critical than the toss of a halfpenny."—Sal. Rcr., xxxiv. 192.

Ine Divina Commeria and Cansoniere of Dante Alispheri: with Biographical Introduction, Notes, and Essays, &c.: vol. i., Lon., 1886, 8vo.

"This handsome volume is the first instalment of the great work on which Dean Plumptre is understood to have been for many years engaged, and which will comprise, when completed, a translation of the whole of the 'Commedia,' and also the 'Canzoniere,' with illustrative notes throughout; besides a life of the poet, and a series of essays or monographs on subjects of the highest interest and importance connected with his works. The present volume contains the life and the translation of the 'Inferno' and 'Purgatorlo.'. The life is of very great value; indeed, one of the best that has yet been published in our own or any other language. It is written in a very vivid and attractive style. . . It displays the most minute acquaintance not only with all the various works of Dante, but with numerous historians and critics who throw light on the subject. . We turn with more mingled satisfaction to the translation. Perhaps a rooted conviction of the imposibility of the task (viz., the approximate reproduction of the terza rima) may bias one's judgment. . . We find on almost every page epithets or ideas introduced which, even if appropriate in themselves, are not represented by anything in the original. . . The notes . . are very helpful, contain much curious information, and . . are often very full, and yet condensed."—E. Moore: Acad., xxx. 419.

13. The Life and Letters of Thomas Ken, D.D., Bishop of Bath and Wells. Illust. Lon., 1888, 2 vols. 8vo.

"This, in all likelihood, is the final biography of Ken... Many searchers have volunteered their services in Dean Plumptre's undertaking; ... much special information has been contributed by recognized experts in some of the subjects treated. ... But it is not the amount of absolutely new material which constitutes the main value of this life and raises it far above its predecessors. Rather it is the skill and tender patience wherewith material already known, but neglected, has been manipulated."—Acad., xxxiv. 281.

"The enormous expansion to which the writer has subjected the materials at his command—an expansion applied impartially to what was important and what was unimportant—has necessarily left the picture somewhat thin and colourless."—Ath., No. 3186.

In passing over an investigation of the psychological side of music Dr. Pole may, no doubt, say that he is following Helmholtz's example. But . . . Helmholtz does not offer his treatise as a philosophy of music, whereas Dr. Pole does. . . What he has aimed at doing he has actually done, and done well. "All that has been gleaned, and gathered, and conjectured even, regarding the life and opinions of the great Hebrew thinker has been diligently studied by Mr. Pollock and year, statement Mr. Pollock makes regarding the facts may be accepted as true. He has given us in the introduction a critical account of all the important contributions to our knowledge of Spinoza which have appeared in various languages. He has sifted the numerous works which in recent years have discussed the various problems regarding the sources of Spinoza's philosophy. He has pondered over the aim, purpose, and method of Spinoza until these have almost become part of his own mental structure, and he sets forth the system of his master, not with the calm circunspection of one who expounds a philosophy, but with the zeal, the earnestness, and with something of the intolerant flerceness of one who propagates a religion."—Spectator, liv. 187.

"A string of old sailors' 'yarns,' most capitally spun, and sufficiently related to great events and great people to give them a never-failing interest. Some of the language which represents the remarks of Grant and Sherman and others is not to be considered in the light of a verbutim report, nor are the anecdotes themselves to be judged by the standard of accuracy to which they would be subjected if they were put forth as deliberate historical statements."—

"The most satisfactory chapters, as might be expected, are those narrating events that came under the author's own eye. . . In passing judgment upon his contemporaries the Admiral is outspoken, but always fair and free from prejudice or partisan feeling. . . . When he is off his own ground, his narrative is disjointed, involved, sometimes almost incoherent."—Nation, xliii. 310.

"As the Nestor of the geological army of Britain, Prof. Prestwich is naturally conservative. But his conservatism is of so liberal a type that probably not even the rawest and, naturally, also most advanced recruit would be found to object to it. His purpose in this work is, indeed, to interpret the generally accepted facts of geology according to the views of the non-uniformitarian school, and that he does so with marked skill goes without saying; but his opposition is only to the most extreme forms of the Uniformitarian creed, and he repudiates all the more startling vagaries of the old Catastrophists. . . As to the volumes themselves, they are without doubt the handsomest which geology has yet seen devoted to its teaching. . . . The illustrations are unique."—Ath., No. 3184.

"Theory and fact are seldom so happily united as in this volume... Mr. Price does not fall into the error which has been called—by Jevons, if we remember rightly—the fallacy of a single principle. He is aware that there cannot be 'any single panacea for social ills.' He expects to see 'the old relation of wage-payer and wage-receiver continuing side by side with the new developments' of cooperation and industrial partnership. He does not attempt to conflue within strict classifications the endless variety of affairs and institutions. At the same time, by a judicious arrangement, he enables us to grasp the immense mass of heterogeneous details which he embraces."—F. Y. Edgeworth: Acad., xxxii, 402.

1837-1888, b. in London; educated at King's College, London, and at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1860 as twenty-third wrangler; elected B Fellow of the Royal Astronomical Society in 1866. In 1869 he advanced, on theoretical grounds, a theory of the solar corona which has since been generally accepted, and also that of the inner complex solar atmosphere, which was afterwards advanced by Prof. Charles A. Young. Much of his time was given to the popular-ization of scientific results. He founded Knowledge as a weekly journal in 1881, but changed it in 1885 to a monthly. He contributed largely to other periodicals, monthly. He contributed largely to other periodicals, and was very successful as a lecturer. He made a lecturing tour in the United States in 1873-74, and another in Australia and New Zealand in 1879, and in 1884 returned to the United States, and after lecturing in various cities settled in St. Joseph, Mo. new ed., 1880.

"In the present work we have a very fair statement of the various problems with respect to the sun which have either been solved or at present await solution... Mr. Proctor's chief defect is that he is a little too apt now and then to write as a special pleader for one of several conflicting theories, for none of which there can be said perhaps to be quite decisive evidence. Still, perhaps the general public will hardly look upon this as a fault; and at all events, if a fault, it adds considerable vivacity to the book."

"It is not often that our literature is enriched by a work on so virgin a soil as Mr. Ralston has begun to till in the book before us. . . It is thoroughly well executed throughout, and bears no trace of the painful toil which its author must have undergone before he could himself fully understand, and then convey so pleasantly to his readers, the idiomatic sense of the many songs and spells in obscure dialects of a difficult language, which are to be read in easy English in his pages. . . Mr. Raiston has acted very wisely in making this, his first book on the subject, neither too large nor too learned."—Sat. Rev., xxxiii. 441.

"His main position is that war is 'one of the good things of the world,' and, politically and morally, not only justifiable but beneficent. Nature, he argues, has obviously chosen, chiefly and by preference, forcible methods—pittless methods, if you will—for the improvement of the denizens of the earth. Her law is that the weak must go to the wall, and it is best that it should be so. Any interference with her plans only leads to a diminution of the general welfare. . . . Mr. Ram sees clearly what his premises involve, and accepts the conclusion that 'the whole world is turned upon the pivot of adversity.' . . . The whole superstructure rests on the assumption that this world is under the dominion, not of a loving and righteous Creator and Father, but of a certain power called Nature. . . We need hardly say that we hold this to be a great and dangerous falsehood. Bearing, however, this protest and the inferences from it in mind, the most timid reader will get nothing but good from the bracing and vigorous atmosphere of Mr. Ram's pages." - Spectator, ii. 359.

"The 'narrative,'... which figures so largely in the title and so meagrely in the book itself, is an illustration of the old saying that almost anybody who will simply and faithfully record what he has heard and seen in life is in a position to add to the public stock of amusement or of information. To the outer world this 'study of an obscure Puritan colony' is entertaining and instructive, even after the more vivid pictures of dissenting life painted by the author of 'Salem Chapel.'. The remainder.. is as dull and wearisome a salmagandi of all the odds and ends that a tolerably clever and intensely self-complacent gentleman could put upon paper as it has been our weary duty to toil through for months past."—Sal. "It was not Gibbon's purpose to examine in detail the reigns of the Sassanids as sovereigns of Persia, or to describe the condition of that country under each of those monarchs. Mr. Rawlinson has undertaken this work, and he has done it with conscientious care. His style may lack animation, and the reader may here and there find it difficult to shake off a sense of weariness; but Mr. Rawlinson may be supposed to have accustomed himself to the stately pace of Eastern caravans, and experience has taught us that we are not to expect from him either more rapid or more lively movement. Still, there is nothing to regret in the appearance of this volume. It is distinctly an addition to the sum of our historical knowledge, which historical students will find it worth their while to read.

GENERAL CRITICISM :

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"Mr. Reade's real power, which we acknowledge to be considerable, appears to us to consist in three things. He can depict the outsides of his characters admirably. He cannot or does not make them thoroughly intelligible, but he can and does make them real. . . . Then Mr. Reade can both invent and describe incident, stirring incident, with a force which has been given to few novelists. . . . And, finally, Mr. Reade has a command of pathos which he very rarely indeed exerts, but which is of a very genuine and rare kind. . . . These are great qualities in a novelist; yet Mr. Reade himself will probably regard the reviewer who acknowledges them as a slightly malignant idiot, because he sees in the writing more of metallic iridescence than of true, self-derived flash. Well, each one has the defect of his qualities, and a modest man could not have written Charles Reade's novels at all."—Spectator, lv. 928.

"It is a clumsy compilation, made up of hitherto unprinted essays and scraps of letters and diaries,—which, the reader is told, Mr. C. L. Reade has 'selected with care from a voluminous mass of literary and personal remains, individually.'—and of 'narrative' by Mr. Compton Reade. Neither portion of the work has been well done."—Ath., No. 3103.

"His speculations represent years of patient thought, while they possess the rare advantage of being put forth by one who commands a practical knowledge of mechanics acquired during a long professional career as an engineer and architect. . . . According to Mr. Reade, the favourite hypothesis of contraction by loss of heat is utterly incompetent to account for the phenomena of mountain-building; indeed, he believes that the cooling of our earth has not extended to such a depth that we need consider the internal contraction as a geological cause! His own view—the view which it is the prime object of this treatise to expound—regards mountain-ranges as due to sedimentation, accompanied by local changes of temperature in the earth's crust."—F. What he has done is to give us a carefully worked-out, and on the whole trustworthy, compendium of the millennial reign of the Papacy, from the pontificate of Gregory I. to Leo X., divided into its three periods of 'growth,' 'greatness,' and 'decline.' As a work of reference the volume will be found of great service, . . . and it may well be used . . . as an introduction to larger works."—Sot. Rev., xxx. 780.

"This book is a very admirable piece of work... It is deeply interesting to all who have fived through the political period to which it refers, and, so far as we can judge, will be deeply interesting even to future generations of politicians... For the rest, Mr. Wemyss Reid's sketch of the man is admirably effective."—Spectator, ixi. 967.

"Throughout his narrative, dealing often at great length and in much detail with complicated political transactions, he has kept well in mind the fundamental consideration that he is a biographer, not an historian... Men who have followed closely the political career of Mr. Forster, and whom necessity or choice has acquainted with the controversies in which he was engaged, will find that they have still something to learn from Mr. Wemyss Reid's volumes... But the main charm of the present book lies in the glimpses it affords of the growth and formation of a remarkable and unique character."—Sut. Rev., ixvi. 46.

"Mr. Rendle, whom we may look upon as the author, has already written an account of Southwark, in which, though he betrayed the usual weakness of the local antiquary, and especially of the London local antiquary, namely, an ignorance of early mediæval history,—he also showed great skill in seizing and enlarging upon what would interest the general public. In this feat he seems to have succeeded a second time. . . It has one great characteristic which should not be overlooked. It is all the result of original research and observation."—Sal. "The analysis of ancient Egyptian belief completely upsets the theory of De Brosses, which Professor Max Müller had in the first series of the Hibbert Lectures shown to be untenable,—namely, that all religion had its beginning in Fetishism; while the examination of Egyptian myths adds vastly to the strength of the conclusions reached by comparative mythologists who have worked in the wide field of Aryan tradition. To these two points Mr. Renouf addresses himself specially throughout these lectures; and if we admit the truthfulness of the picture, we must allow that his work has made substantial additions to our knowledge on a subject the importance of which cannot be exaggerated."—Sul. "Few even of those who have given some study to the subject will be prepared to meet with such an abundance of well-established (or, at least, highly probable) results as are brought together in the earlier chapters. It is doubtless true, as the author would be the first to acknowledge, that the book contains, besides the conclusions which may be regarded as fairly secure, a large number of suggestions which future investigation may very likely show to be untenable. . . . The Hibbert Lectures on Celtic mythology will be none the less an epoch-making book."—HENRY BRADLEY: Acad., XXXIII.389.

"The whole book is readable, from the vivid sketch of the pantheon of the Allobroges that takes up its earlier pages, down to the summing up of the proto-Celtic creed in its final lines. . . Full and minute as it is, and complete in itself, this volume is but the first part of a great Celtic mythology of which two more parts (on the 'Dark Underwold Divinities' and on the 'Arthurian Legend') are to appear, it is to be hoped shortly."—F. and annotated by the editor.)

"His study of the Brehon laws endowed him with an acuteness of perception that enabled him to thread his way with unerring instinct through the mazes of Irish history. More than this, it taught him to appreciate the feelings of the Irish natives, and at the same time to do justice to those efforts of the English Government which, however mistaken in design, however fruitless in results, were for the most part born of a good intention and an honest desire to civilize Ireland. . . . His work is not so much a history in the ordinary sense, as an organon or a clue wherewith to read history. And this is just what is wanted at the present time, when so many earnest students are being attracted to Irish history."—R. Dunlop: Acad., xxxiii. 22.

"This is a valuable book, but... the style is dry and wanting in charm. Dr. Richter does not write for the general reader: he specially addresses the art student....
His object is to give a history of the Italian schools as illustrated by the pictures in the National Gallery... Of the photographs which illustrate the book it is impossible to speak with too high praise."—Spectator, 1vi. 616.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

ANNE, supra.

General Criticism:

"The peculiar pleasure which all cultivated readers derive from Miss Thackeray's novels is by no means easy to analyze or describe. It is not polynant and intense, but exquisite and satisfying,—more satisfying, indeed, than much of the pleasure which has the qualities of polynancy and intensity. . . The interest of work like this is artistic rather than simply human. . . . By very delicate instinct she is able to discern, and by very subtle art to realize and make apparent, the interest which lies in the neglected corners of common life. It is comparatively easy to picture agreat rapture or a great agony, though the picture can be executed adequately only by the power of genius but to catch and fix those moments of complex emotion in which joy and sorrow, hope and fear, content and weariness, strike through the heart in such quick alternation as to seem simultaneous, is a task so difficult as to be impossible save to some highly-gifted artist. And yet these moments are much more frequent than the great crises of overmastering feeling: life is made up of them; and much of the charm of Miss Thackeray's work lies in her power of realizing those half-tones which most novelists compel us to take for granted."—Spectator, lix. 84.

"No work more clear and true and pure, more full of tenderness and grace, and of that insight which nothing but a keen sympathy with every phase of joy and sorrow can give, is produced among us than that by which she sustains the honours of her father's name."—Sat. Rev., xxxv. 623.

trine of the Earth's Movement, Lon., 1885, 8vo.

"The author of this book is a clergyman educated at Oxford who followed Cardinal Manning (of whom he is a near connection by marriage) into the Church of Rome, and was for many years a highly esteemed and beloved member of a congregation of secular priests, called Oblates of St. Charles, whom the cardinal established in London. In 1870 he joined in the movement set on foot amongst the more learned and conscientious of the Catholic clergy to avert the threatened decree of Papal infallibility, and published an essay with the object of showing that Papal authority had plainly committed itself to the condemnation of Galileo, and so unanswerably demonstrated its own fallibility. The present work is a much enlarged republication of that essay. . . The full and true significance of Galileo's trial is now for the first time put plainly before the world."—Ath., No. 3016.

"The local cult of Bewick . . . is of long standing, and was never more flourishing than now. We owe to it not only his townsman's impulse to build this latest monument to the artist and to the man, but that access to collections which gives a peculiar value to Mr. Robinson's labour of love. . . . He is the first admirer of their father who has had the intimate acquaintance of the daughters of Bewick for a quarter-century, as a qualification for the task which he has now accomplished so creditably."—Nation, xlv. 317.

"The amount of hard work among manuscripts to which the volumes before us testify is simply enormous.

... As Mr. Rogers has taken a wide view of his duties, there is hardly an object of domestic life that is not mentioned in his pages. Apart from their value as a great contribution towards a history of England, they will be a perfect treasure to the editors of old documents and the student of manners."—4th., No. 2847.

"After collecting and tabulating the most elaborate statistics of prices, both of food and of commodities of every kind, in early ages, Mr. Rogers gives it as his deliberate opinion that the theory of 'the good old times' was not far from the truth. Not that this is the way he himself expresses it, but this is very distinctly the result of his researches. For he tells us that the period which, of all others, most people probably regard as the most uncomfortable in all English history was really marked by 'substantial, unbroken prosperity.' In spite of civil brolls, 'the fifteenth century and the early years of the sixteenth were the golden age of the English husbandman, the artisan, and the labourer.' . . . 'The condition of the English people,' he says, expressly, 'was that of an almost monotonous prosperity.' . . . Mr. Rogers is rather given to the practice of enunciating opinions on matters apart from his own subject which have no other foundation than his own surmises. . . But the solid facts contained in the work are, of course, its main justification, and these make it quite an indispensable book to all who wish to study closely our social and economic history."—James Gaird-Ner: Acad., xxi. 277. NER: Acad., xxi. 277. Vols. v., vi., 1888.

"The present volumes have all the merits and defects of their predecessors. They show all the former mastery over detail and the same familiar knowledge of the political and social history of the times of which they treat; blended with this, and as we teel in most inharmonious contrast, we have now and then expressions of party feeling which jar on the reader,"—Alh., No. 3159.

"Mr. Rogers is one of the very few people who partially, it may be, and from a single point of view, do know the English middle ages. . . Mr. Rogers's present volumes consist in part of a working up into continuous narrative and argumentative form of the data given in his 'History of Prices.' in part of a similar working up of similar data collected from other writers for the period since Elizabeth's reign to the present day. . . . His picture in the first three or four hundred pages of the condition of the lower and middle classes in England during the middle ages—a picture whose details may be familiar to scholars, but which must certainly be novel to the general reader—has great interest and merit."—Sal. "This work is an exhaustive monograph on the subject of which it treats. . . All the propositions set forth in the book are supported by copious—indeed, by too copious—references and quotations. . . The style of the book is good, and its substance excellent. Coming, as it does, to the same conclusions as Mr. Seebohm's book, with such an immense array of authorities in support, it is clear that the old theory which finds the origin of Teutonic life in freedom and communism, in face of the new doctrine, which finds it in slavery and individualism, needs at least considerable revision, if, indeed, it must not be abandoned altogether."—Spectator, Ivil. 21.

GENERAL CRITICISM:

General Criticism:

"Poetry more picturesque it would be hard to find. It is not only that, after it is expressed, she can set off and illustrate her thought or feeling by pictures, but that picture is her customary and natural means of expression. The abstract she has nothing to do with; in her mind, as her mind is here revealed, every idea puts on shape and color. Incident to this power of hers is that characteristic of her writing which, on a first perusal, is the most striking, and which has been so attractive to the wearled reader of ninety in a hundred of recent poets,—namely, the simplicity, frequently homely or quaint, the pictorial vividness, the life, of her language."—Nation, iii. 47.

"Miss Rossetti ranks foremost among living poetesses. She and she alone could write such magic lyrics as 'Dream-Land.' Her sonnets bear but a small proportion to her purely lyrical poems. Some were written at a very early age; they are all or mostly very sombre, but are as impressive as they are beautiful. . . There is a very marked affinity between much of Miss Rossetti's work and that of her brother Gabriel."—WILLIAM SHARP: Sonnets of this (tratury, Notes, 317.

Rossetti, Gabriel Charles Dante, known as Dante Gabriel Rossetti, [ante, vol. ii., add.]

Dante Gabriel Rossetti, [ante, vol. ii., add.,] 1828-1882; b. in London, and educated at King's College 1828—1832; 6. In London, and educated at Aing's College School; became a student at the Royal Academy, and in 1849 exhibited his first picture, "The Girlhood of Mary Virgin." About that time the Pre-Raphaelite Brother-hood, of which he was the leading spirit, was formed, and hood, of which he was the leading spirit, was formed, and in 1850 they established a magazine, The Germ, in which some of Rossetti's poems appeared, two of which, "The Blessed Damozel" and "My Sister's Sleep," were written before he was nineteen years old. Besides his contributions to the Germ, a periodical which had only a brief existence, Rossetti published a few poems in the Oxford and Cambridge Magazine in 1856. For many years he published very little; and, while he exercised a marked influence upon the English literature and art of his day. fluence upon the English literature and art of his day, lished very little; and, while he exercised a marked influence upon the English literature and art of his day, his poems were known only to a few, and his paintings, which he refused during his lifetime to exhibit in any public gallery, were all in private collections. He died, after a long period of ill health, at Westgate-on-Sea, near Margate, Kent, and was buried in the neighboring church-yard of Birchington. Two exhibitions of his pictures were held in London after his death. For biog., see HALL, T. CAINE, and KNIGHT, JOSEPH, supra, and SHARP, WILLIAM, infra. 1. Poems, Lon., 1870, p. 8vo. "In no poems is the spontaneous and habitual interpenctration of matter and manner, which is the essence of poetry. more complete than in these. An original and subtile beauty of execution expresses the deep mysticism of thought which in some form and degree is not wanting certainly to any poets of the modern school, but which in Mr. Rossetti's work is both great in degree and passionate in kind. Nor in him has it any tendency to lose itself amid allegory or abstractions; indeed, instead of turning human life into symbols of things vague and not understood, it rather gives to the very symbols the personal life and variety of mankind. No poem in this book is without the circle of this realizing mysticism, which deals wonderingly with all real things that can have poetic life given them by passion, and refuses to have to do with any invisible things that in the wide scope of its imagination cannot be made perfectly distinct and poetically real."—WILLIAM MORRIS: Acad., i. 199.

"The supernatural element of poetry... finds here an expression as genuine, as unadulterated with the self-conscious knowingness of a scientific age, as if the poems had been written in the time of Shakspeare, or even in the time of Roger Bacon. Here perhaps is Mr. Rossetti's distinctive and most prominent place in the literature of our time. What other people try to do and fail to do—give a poetic embodiment to the 'cerie' mood of nature as she lies dreaming of man's destiny.—Mr. Rossetti does with so much apparent ease that he scarcely seems to try at all."—4th., No. 2815.

3. Collected Works. Edited, with Preface and Notes, by William M. Rossetti. 1886, 2 vols. p. 8vo. (Includes, besides the contents of former volumes, here newly arranged, pieces and fragments in prose and verse, some reprinted from periodicals, and others previously unpublished.)

General Criticism:

"Perhaps the most obvious positive characteristic of Mr. Rossetti's poetry is its picture-squeness. He is not merely a painter and a poet, but a painter-poet, which is a different thing. . . . His imagination is so concrete that its creations always present themselves to him as things of form and colour, and his sonnets spread themselves out like fair paintings on the walls of the gallery of the mind. . . For sonnet craftemanship which realizes the ideal, which leaves us with the pleasant languor of complete satisfaction, the delicious drowsiness of fulfilled delight, we know of nothing comparable to these great gifts which we owe to Dante Gabriel Rossetti."—J. A. Noble: Contemporary Review. xxxvii. 469.

"Falling back upon Milton's well-worn epithets, in his letter to Master Hartlib 'On Education,' we protest that the poetry of these 'Sonnets' is neither 'simple, sensuous,' nor 'passionate.' That the language is too often fraught with what Sir Hugh Evans would call 'affectations' is a matter of small moment, and verbal criticism just now is as far as possible from our thoughts. But the ideas are, for nine tenths of the subject-matter, far too fine and subtle. Love strong as death is, rightly and naturally enough, the staple of such a series, and with Mr. Rossetti love is lord of all. He 'sighs like a furnace,'—there is no mistake at all about that; but are his sonnets really passionate? In our belief they are not.'—Spectator, Iv. 269.

"Sonnets... unexampled in the English language since Shakespeare's for depth of thought and skill and felicity of execution."—William Morris: dead, l. 199.

"Dante Gabriel Rossetti is not only one of the great poets of the century, but the one English poet whose sonnet-work can genuinely be weighed in the balance with that of Shakespeare and with that of Wordsworth. No influence is at present more marked than his: its stream is narrower than that of Tennyson and Browning, but the current is deep, and its fertilizing waters have penetrated far into the soil. .

And the Fine Art Society has been excellently advised as to the drawings which it was good to reproduce."—FREDERICK WEDMORE: Acad., xviii. 245. "Sparkling bits of aphoristic wit and wisdom are scattered in profusion over these letters, even those of which the main tenor is paradoxical or unpractical. Without attempting to deny that many of the social and economical opinions and proposals here put forward are of this unpractical character, I think the reader will nevertheless feel himself stirred and animated in a way in which more sober and well-considered suggestions never move him. Mr. Ruskin does but feel more keenly than the rest of us those evils which spoil and darken the wholesomeness and beauty of modern life. . . . Discussion or argument is not forwarded by such downright denunciation of existing evil as is here found. But we are quickened and invigorated for the struggle in which we are all engaged with the misery of the world, and the stuggish and the selfish may be reached by Mr. Ruskin's random arrows where homilies and exhortations are all in vain."—MARK PATTISON: Acad., xix. 109.

"A collection of Mr. Ruskin's letters de omitions rebus to the periodical press and to private persons during the last forty years. . . . Concerning the contents of the first volume, which is wholly given up to matters affecting art, there is likely to be comparatively little serious difference of opinion. . . In many of the points touched upon, time and the writer have proved themselves a match for any two. . . The most curious and important portion of the book, however, is, beyond all doubt, the second volume, in which the utterances of the author on all sorts of questions unconnected with art are . . . recorded."—Sa'. GENERAL CRITICISM :

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"It is simply impossible for the present generation to comprehend what Mr. Ruskin has done for Art... Even those who most reverence him can never realize fully the revolution effected by his first books in the period of indifference and ignorance which prevailed at the time of their publication.... His writings came like a revelation. The beauty of his language, the depth of his feelings, the unconventionality of his views, the firmness of his convictions, nay, even his very intolerancy, all tended to rouse attention and interest. His influence has permeated far and wide, and acts now on many who are probably quite unconscious of it and of what they owe him."—Spectator, lx1. 1733.

and wide, and acts now on many who are probably quite unconscious of it and of what they owe him."—Spectator, Ixi. 1733.

"At his worst Mr. Ruskin is a better writer than most men; at his best he is incomparable. He has a magnificent vocabulary, a perfect and unerring sense of expression, a wonderful instinct of rhythm... There are few manners in literature at once so affluent and so varied, so coppous and so subtle, so capable and so full of refinement, as that of the author of 'Modern Painters.' The reason why it is felt to be so is, we take it, that Mr. Ruskin, in fact, is not only great as a writer, but great as an intelligence and a man. To a mind extraordinarily active yet capacious, extraordinarily vigorous yet subtle; to an imagination unwontedly rich and vivid and splendid, he adds the previous attribute of a noble heart, a sweet and earnest temper, and a boundless good-will. These attributes are perceived in his work, and impart to it, however questionable its aim and however dubitable its conclusions, a certain fine and human quality of reality, which is one secret of its prodigious force."—1th., No. 2773.

"The cardinal doctrine which runs through all his teaching can be stated in a line. It is that men—men and not the works of men, men and not materials, or machines, or gold, or even pictures, or statues, or public buildings—should be the prime objects of our care, and reverence, and love. Hence it is that as a writer on art, he necessarily becomes a moralist, since he must needs inquire from what human faculties does this work of art arise, and to what human faculties does this work of art arise, and to the decline of architecture or painting he reads the degradation of national character. Hence it is that the life of the workman appears to him to be of higher importance than the quantity of work which he turns out. Hence it is that he has opposed himself to the orthodox political economy, with a sense that man, and the life and soul of the workman appears to him to be of higher importance or read

2. Hayti: or. The Black Republic, Lon., 1884, or. 8vo.

"It is certainly disheartening reading for any believer in the doctrine of development, or for any friend of the African race. The result of twenty years' personal knowledge is the impression that the country is in a state of rapid decadence, and that, in spite of the civilizing elements around them, there is a distinct tendency to sink into the state of an African tribe."—Sat. Rev., Ivili. 572.

"This remarkable, terribly honest, and ruthlessly realistic book is not so much a historical and statistical account of Hayti as an indictment against the people that inhabit it.—or shall we say a plea for its annexation by any nation that may claim to itself the Carlylian mission of 'chaining anarchy'? Sir Spenser St. John's object is to prove that Hayti is sunk in misery. bloodshed, cannibalism, and supersition of the most sensual and degrading character: that as an experiment in negro self-government it is a hideous failure; and that yet, bad as its condition now is, still lower deeps of ruin are gaping wide to receive it.

It is not difficult to tell how such a book as this is likely ere long—whether rightly or wrongly—to be translated into action. It cannot forever be tolerated that man should be allowed to do his worst in a country for which Nature has done her best."—Spectator, Ivii. 1521.

"The general reader will naturally be most interested in the chapters Mr. Salmon devotes to a refutation of many of the statements made by Mr. Froude in his recent work, 'The English in the West Indies.' If Governor Salmon is correct, (and he gives chapter and verse for all that he says.) Mr. Froude's work teems with gross inaccuracies."—Ath., No. 3156.

"The gist of the contention is that, while Mr. Froude considers that the West Indies in general and the negro in particular would benefit by being placed under autocratic but paternal rule, Mr. Salmon would establish at once a scheme of 'local self-government' for every island, with a low franchise to allow the black man to exercise full political rights, so that the control might not be in the hands of a white oligarchy. . . Mr. Salmon proposes that the fifteen states (including British Guiana and Honduras) comprised in the vast area of the West Indies should send members to a General Assembly in proportion to their population."—Sal. Pool of Siloam in Jerusalem, Lon., 1881. 10. Herodotus, I.-III., (The Ancient Empires of the East:) with Notes, Introduction, and Appendioes, Lon., 1883, 8vo.

"In his Introduction, which will probably attract more general attention than any other twenty pages in the volume, Prof. Sayce draws up the most tremendous indictment against Herodotus that was ever launched by modern critic against the reputation of a dead and gone scribe.

... No apologist need ever more hope to rebuild the reputation which now crumbles to dust before the destructive logic of Dr. Weidemann (Geschichte Aeguptens von Psammetich I. bis auf Alexander den Grossen) and the merciless indictment of Prof. Sayce."—AMBLIA B. EDWARDS: Acad., XXIV. 323.

"Mr. Sayce has a very good right to his opinion, as he has travelled over most of the lands described by Herodotus, as he can read inscriptions which were to Herodotus mere hopeless puzzles, and as he enjoys all the advantages of modern criticism. Yet we could wish he was less hard on Herodotus, whom he seems to regard more as 'the Father of Lies' than as the 'Father of History.' ... His remarks are invariably readable, and even vivacious, and, however much we may dissent from his opinions, they are opinions which no one can afford to neglect. But, from the language of Herodotus to the latest Hittle inscription, how obscure do these topics remain!"—Sat. Rev., 1vt. 507.

"The intrinsic value of the document scarcely justifies the amount of writing it has called forth, particularly in England and America. . . . It proved to be moral rather than degmatic in tone, touching upon conduct and customs, the rites and administration of early churches, without asserting a distinctive theology. . . . The volume is a monument of comprehensive knowledge and careful claboration. Like all Dr. Schaff's books, it is characterized by the extensive crudition which a laborious German scholar may be supposed to possess. "In writing a book upon this great and attractive subject, Mr. Scharf has been fortunate in having an absolutely moccupied field. . . He has shown evident diligence in accumulating materials, and his book includes a valuable collection of mémoires pour servir. . . In many chapters his materials have been loosely thrown together, with little regard to style or to structural arrangement. . . . The most extraordinary feature, however, of Mr. Scharf's otherwise useful book is the undercurrent of political animosity and bitterness which penetrates all his references to the causes of the war and the conduct and motives of the Union leaders."—Nation, xlv. 115.

Schliemann, Heinrich, 1822-1890, b. at An-kershagen, Mecklenburg; became a grocer's assistant at the age of fourteen; in 1846 was sent to St. Petersburg as the agent of a Dutch commercial house, and, having established a business of his own and accumulated a considerable fortune, determined in 1863 to devote himself to archæological researches. After several years spent in travelling in different parts of the world and in a course of preliminary study at Paris, he began in 1871 the explorations at Hissarlik, the supposed site of ancient Troy, which resulted in discoveries that aroused a strong interest not only among scholars but with the general public, which was increased by his similar excavations at Mycenæ, begun in 1874, and by further explorations at Hissarlik. From 1883 he made his permanent residence at Athens. He had become a naturalized citizen of the United States during a short stay in California in 1850, and he made several subsequent visits to America. In 1868 he published, in French and German, a work on Ithaca, the Peloponnesus, and Troy, and in 1874 a work on Troy and its Remains, in German, which was translated into English by Miss L. Dora Schmitz, (q. v., infra.) The later works enumerated below have appeared without any mention of a translator, and are therefore presumed to have been originally written in English, or to have been translated by the author himself. 1. Mycenæ: Discoveries and Researches on the Sites of Ancient Micenæ and Tiryns: with a Preface by the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P., Lon., 1877, 8vo.

"Whatever may be the verdict of science on Dr. Schliemann's discoveries, it must be admitted that he has hit on an unexplored stratum of buried history. . . He has had the energy to do what the rest of the world might have talked of doing for centuries."—Sat. Rev., xlv. 83.

H. Sayce, J. P. Mahaffy, H. Brugsch Bey, P. Ascherson, M. A. Postoloccas, M. E. Burnouf, Mr. H. Calvert, and Mr. A. J. Duffield: with Maps, Plans, and about Eighteen Hundred Illustrations, Lon., 1880, imp. 8vo.

Lon., 1880, imp. 8vo.

"Hos' is perhaps the worst arranged book that ever came under our notice. Admirable as a discoverer, a digger, a diviner of ancient sites, Dr. Schliemann is an assonishingly bad writer. . . . We do not find fault with Dr. Schliemann for not being an accomplished scholar or a trained archæologist. He is something better; he is a man of real genius. No one but a genius could have lived the life Dr. Schliemann describes in his autobiography, keeping always before his eyes the ideal of Homeric research. . . . But his discoveries are one thing and his new book quite another. . . We must admit that Dr. Schliemann has hardly given himself a fair chance as a writer. He is entangled helplessly in the ranks of his allies and camp-followers."—Sal. Rev., 11. 55.

the Great, Emperor of Russia: a Study of Historical Biography. Illust. N. York, 1884, 2 vols. 8vo.

"In the work before us there is no rounded picture of either Peter, his nation, or his time, but Peter, his nation, and his time are made to pass before us in successive attitudes, actions, and stages, in chronological order, and the reader is left to judge and combine. . . Mr. Schuyler had before him an immense literature from which to draw materials. . . . He has availed himself of these resources with extraordinary diligence, extracting from blographies, memoirs, diaries, correspondence, and records of all kinds an amount of particulars sufficient to give a fulness to each separate subdivision of his subject, and vastly more than sufficient for the general characterization. And herein lie both the strength and the weakness of Mr. Schuyler's work. The division and arrangement of his matter are excellent, and there is order in the whole and symmetry in the parts; but the fulness of the parts makes the whole heavy, though clearness is everywhere preserved in spite of the great crowding of facts. . . . Its profusely varied, highly characteristic, and not seldom to every library."—Nation, xxxviii. 389.

"He has absolutely nothing of the pictorial faculty for persons, though he shows occasionally some for scenes. . . Still, to patient readers the book is most valuable."— Spectator, lvii. 250.

"This faithful study of an ancestral line throws a strong light upon the solid virtues of the Dutch founders of our commonwealth, and deserves the praise of all New Yorkers who are proud of the truth that Holland is an equal sharer with England in the building of their State."—Nation, xill. 81.

"The first part of the essay deals chiefly with the current theories of the origin of commoners' rights in England. Mr. Scrutton seems to prefer the view that they began in almost every case with an actual grant from a Norman land-owner. . . The second part of the work . . . contains a lucid and well-sustained account of the policy of the legislation and the practice of the land-owners with regard to enclosures. new ed., 1834.

"He has chosen, and fairly chosen, Stein as the protagonist of his drama, and has combined a minute biography of one statesman of the epoch with sketches of a great number who clustered round him or came in contact with him, and with disquisitions on the leading events and political complications of the period. His work has all the merits and defects of this plan. It furnishes at once a complete biography, a repertory of information, and a manual of sensible discussion. . . The book answers the purpose of a biographical encyclopsedia of all the eminent Germans who played a part in the political history of the early years of the present century. . . The work has also defects which do not arise from its plan. The first of these defects is its enormous prolixity. . . The second defect of the book is a certain flabblness of style."—Sat. "He is . . . quite in accord with Mr. Arnold in his rejection of the utilitarian view of education, and in making the perfection of our nature consist in the harmonious development of all its capacities. But he quarrels with him for advocating a culture which must become practically 'a principle of exclusion and isolation,' unattainable by the many, and for assigning to religion a secondary place."

"The man or the woman who would understand Professor Shairp's book must bring to it a mind already in keen sympathy with his subject. For such he has provided a true intellectual feast. Young students, to whom he especially addresses himself, will find themselves here in communion with a mind which places its rich resources at their disposal."—Spectator, 1, 951.

9. Robert Burns, ("English Men of Letters,") Lon., 1879, p. 8vo.
"The only defect we have observed in this very thoughtful and truthful life of Burns... is that it hardly gives sufficient sense of the buoyancy and tumult in the temper of the great peasant-poet of Scotland,—that it wants a little more animation. The criticism on his poetry and on his life is admirable, and the latter certainly not too severe."—Spectator, lii. 627.

"It is impossible not to compare these lectures with those of Professor Shairp's predecessor,—the greatest English critic of his age,—Mr. Matthew Arnold. In many respects they suffer, but in a few they certainly gain, by the comparison. . . They do more, we think to enhance the charm of the poets with whom they deal than Mr. Arnold's essays did. They do less to signalize particular aspects of those poets, and to present them in unexpected lights. They are less artistic, less finished, more human, and, on the whole, we think, more eloquent."—Spectator, Iv. 88.

"Shairp's poems are healthy as the air they breathe, the air of Ross and Inverness, but pervaded by a spirit of soft regret, in no wise morbid, for a lost past, when the Highland glein were still uncleared... They are saturated with a passion for wild and mountainous scenery; they smell of the heather."—Acad., xxxiii. 318.

"The editor has gone far afield, sparing neither time nor labour in studying, discovering, and comparing sonnets which may be counted by hundreds. He has composed a suggestive treatise on the history, structure, artistic capacity, and various species of this poem. Short biographical notices of all the writers included in this volume have been written, those which deal with living persons being marked by a happy mixture of frankness and sympathy.

Working thus, Mr. Sharp has produced a sonnet-book which represents the best craftsmanship of the nineteenth century."—Arad., xxix. 103.

"As a book for general reading. Sheridan's Memoirs have attractive features that will insure success. The narrative is clear and lively, the events described are important in themselves, and the personality of the hero is always interesting.... For purposes of permanent history, one could wish that the aim had been less popular and more critical; but a long narrative by so distinguished an officer in a great war cannot lack value, even when the narrative is cursory and superficial."—Nation, xiviii. 100.

"The style is generally direct and clear, having the prime merit of telling plainly what the writer had seen and felt vividity, and consequently the sympathy of the reader goes strongly with him to the end. . . The 'March to the Sea' will always have a romantic interest to the readers of American history, and Sherman's narrative of it is perhaps the most attractive part of his book. . . The treatment of his personal relations to others is, throughout, the vulnerable part of General Sherman's book. . . . He too often forgets the rule that the facts should be stronger than the epithets applied to them."—Nation, xx. 411.

"The narrative is clear and concise, and four years of military operations on a gigantic scale are described in fewer words than are required by some authors in writing the history of a couple of battles. The style is, however, full of slang and vulgarisms. We expected something better from one who has received the excellent education of West Point."—Ath., No. 2490.

"Here is a volume to excite attention indeed. Harmony is really to be effected between Science and Religion at last. And not only is the venerable dispute to be settled, but it is to be settled by methods exclusively American, we are told: 'The American geography, genealogy, politics, and religion are simply unparalleled, either in ancient or modern civilization, and together form an aggregate of all that is peculiar to the civilizations of Europe, Asia, and Africa. Such a medley of climates, of races, of institutions, of creeds and theories, fusing under one political system, affords materials for a philosophy which cannot but be final, and by projecting on a grander scale, and with fuller conditions, all the time-worn issues of history-shows that here, if anywhere, the old terrestrial problem is at length to be solved.'"—Nation, xxviii. 18.

subscription, Lon., 1870, 12mo. 2. The Methods of Ethics, Lon., 1874, 8vo; 3d ed., 1884; Supplement, 1877.

"It claims to be an examination, at once expository and critical, of the different methods of obtaining reasoned convictions as to what ought to be done which are to be found—either explicit or implicit—in the moral consciousness of mankind generally, and which, from time to time, have been developed, either singly or in combination, by individual thinkers and worked up into systems now historical."—Author's Preface.

"Mr. Sidgwick, inverting Aristotle's phrase, proposes as his end knowledge, not practice, and adopts the impartial and scientific treatment of a German psychologist. He is neither the advocate nor the assailant, but the investigator. And it may be that this kind of originality, the originality of method, is all the originality he would himself claim for his treatise. He has no new theory to propound, nor does he offer any novel array of argument in support of any one of the standard theories. Yet . . . we have in reading Mr. Sidgwick's pages a sense of that originality which may be imparted to any subject by its being handled in its whole extent and expounded in all its breadth by a powerful mind, a mind which has not only mastered it in all its details, but informed them with its own life."—Sal. Rev., xxxix. 118.

Siemens, Sir Charles William, Ph.D., LL.D., D.C.L., F.R.S., 1823-1883, b. at Leuthe, Hanover; educated at Lübeck, Magdeburg, and Göttingen; went to London in 1843, and, with his brother Werner, engaged in various enterprises, manufacturing the Siemens' steel by a process of their own invention, and taking out numerous patents for electrical apparatus and other scientific inventions. They laid the direct United States cable in 1874 with the steamer "Faraday," which was built for the purpose from designs by C. W. Siemens, who was knighted in recognition of his scientific services in 1883. He was president of the Society of Telegraph Engineers, of the Institute of Mechanical Engineers, of the Midland In-stitute, and, in 1882, of the British Association, and contributed numerous papers to the Transactions of the Royal Society, &c. "This volume contains a reprint of Sir Wm. Siemens' original paper on the 'Conservation of Solar Energy.' communicated to the Royal Society early in 1882, and a number of criticisms and discussions to which that paper gave rise. . . The wide-spread interest which has been taken in the new theory, and the fact that fresh evidence will probably be brought forward and fresh discussions follow in connection with it, are a sufficient justification for the republication of these papers in a collected form. . . Sir W. Siemens' theory suggests a solution of the difficulty, a solution at once ingenious and well considered."—Acad., xxiv. 82.

The papers include explanations of his own inventions, together with presidential addresses and popular lectures." -4th., No. 2216.

"This is in effect an attempt, ingenious and not unskildu, but very much the reverse of convincing, to prove that the world would go on pretty much as it has done if society made up its mind that there is no God. . . . The only thing obscure and vague in Miss Simcox's volume is her notion of religion as continuing to subsist after it has been conclusively established that there is no God. In a general way, she takes help from Mr. Matthew Arnold's ideas of religion as morality plus emotion, and of God as the not-ourselves that makes for righteousness. . . . In point of fact, Miss Simcox has herself more thinking power, in the sense of decisively discriminating between fact and not-fact, between substance and shadow, than Mr. Arnold, and must perceive, if she looks with her usual penetration, that his religious philosophy is mere coloured mist."—Spectator, 1. 1478.

"There was not a great deal to tell; but it deserved telling. The narrative is given with taste and discretion. There is not an over-indulgence in details that are irrelevant or uninteresting. "The averment is that there is a school of philosophy still in existence of which modern culture has lost sight; and that, while modern metaphysics and modern physical science 'have been groping for centuries after knowledge,' occult philosophy has enjoyed it in full measure all the while. ... Mr. Sinnett writes in perfect good faith, and 'The Occult World' contains much that is curious and amusing: but we trust the credulity of the public is not to be gauged by his own as exhibited in this book."—Sal. - 1885.

 "To ourselves' Esoteric Buddhism' seems to be a blending of old Brahmanic ideas of Kaipas and 'austerity' with the speculations of American 'Spiritualists' and a dash of scientific terminology. But . . it is certain that Mr. Sinnett delivers his gospel with much clearness and obvious good faith."—Sal. Rev., 1vi. 119.

 4. Karma: a Novel, Lon., 1885, 2 vols. cr. 8vo.

 "Mr. Sinnett is already favourably known in the world of mirth by his serious works in psychical philosophy. As a professed writer of fiction he is less amusing. . . . The characters in his novel are not nearly so droll as those which figure in his philosophy. . . There is, in fact, a story, though of the dullest kind that has ever been padded out into two volumes. . . The work as a whole, in spite of its absurdities, is one which only an able, ingenious, and courageous man could have written."—Sal. Rev., 1x. 392.

 "If, as we gather from these pages, persons of a most ordinary and unintellectual every-day nature may yet move most transcendental views on occult science may be conveyed in English that is often slipshod, and occasionally vulgar."—Spectator, lix. 1508.

"Mr. Skeat has few rivals in knowledge of the English language and its history; and as for philology, there is no doubt that the root of the matter is in him. Etymology with him is a scientific process, and not a mere series of guesses more or less ingenious and successful. He is well read both in literature and philology, patient, industrious, and painstaking. Accordingly, his dictionary is indispensable to all who would study the English language and its origin scientifically and historically. It is not only a copious resume of modern philological research in a field which has been diligently and successfully cultivated, but it adds to the labours of others the mature results of Mr. Skeat's own profound studies in the same field."—Ath., No. 28:6. "It is not a mere abridgment, as Mr. Skeat is careful to explain, but has been entirely rewritten. It is arranged on what the author calls 'an unusual but excellent plan.' All the derivatives of a given word are made to follow the original word, but the derivatives are also given in their alphabetical order with a cross-reference to the parent word. The plan is certainly unusual; as to its excellence there will probably be much difference of opinion."—Alh., No. 2856.

"A clear and interesting analysis of the 'native' element in English. In some points it shows a distinct advance on the author's 'Etymological Dictionary of the English Language.' The book is, on the whole, the best guide to English etymology that has yet appeared."—Acad., xxxii. 427.

"The graceful writer who has gained an entrance into many of the most delightful corners of our memory under the name of 'Shirley' is scarcely second to any in his generation. When he comes down out of those pleasant valleys and pathways bordered with classic asphodel, and writes himself 'John Skelton.' discourses upon the Poorlaws, or clears out the encumbered by-ways of history, his work is that of an expert, whom his fellow-workmen of all classes take pleasure to see a l'auwr, handling his tools with a precision which delights the trade. ... The new series of the 'Essays of Shirley' now given to the public are of dates varying from 1854 to a very recent period, and consist not of critical and historical studies. Ilke some already issued, but of what the author calls 'Essays in Romance and Studies from Life.' ... The author has chosen his title well, for it would be inappropriate to assume for these imaginative sketches—the discursiveness and freedom of which are among their chief charms—the character of tales."—Spectator, Il. 1497.

Maitland.)
"This volume [the first] is strictly preliminary.... It consists essentially of a sketch of Scottish history and life up to the time when Maitland really became a force in both as secretary or minister to Mary Stuart. As such it can hardly be praised too highly as a sustained effort in pleturesque description and narrative."—WILLIAM WALLACE: Acad., XXXII. 97.
"Whatever may be thought of Mr. Skelton's views either of the present or the past of Scotland, no reader will lay these volumes down without feeling that he owes the author a debt of gratifude for a book of great research which is very pleasant reading, and at the same time highly stimulative to thought and reflection."—Ath., No. 3182.

"It was Mr. Skene's good fortune to have enjoyed Lord Stratford de Redeliffe's confidence during, and indeed for some years before, the Crimean war. While the allies were besleging Sebastopol he acted as the ambassador's confidential agent at the seat of war. . . . His book will be a very gold-mine to the tellers of good stories, but it has a much higher value. It is a careful record by a keen judge of men and manners of the inner life, so to speak, of the fight in the Crimea, and of the diplomatic struggle which went on side by side with that great passage of arms. . . . The author's style is very simple, very clear, and full of point."—Acad., xxvi. 22.

"We may demur to this or that statement, point out some mistakes; we may see that the book lacks depth, that it shows an insufficient acquaintance with original sources, and that it is almost wholly compiled from second-hand authorities: still the volume is an excellent one for popular perusal. Nobody can read it without interest, without loving and admiring those whose struggles and hardships the author paints so well. . . If those who are already familiar with the subject find little that is new, they will derive from the narrative a moral stimulus that may be not without advantage."—Alh., No. 2411.

"The charm of the biography is that the man is represented to us without comment or apology, just as he appeared to his associates. If in Mr. Smiles's pages he becomes the centre of his time, and a sort of pivot on which the mercantile and philanthropic life of the country turned, that was precisely what his career appeared to himself. .. His belief in his power of putting the world right was confirmed by the unchecked prosperity of his private fortunes, which recall the career of Dick Whittington."—Sat. Rev., xlv. 732.

"The inadequacy of the present memoir is the more emphatic from the comparative excellence of Mr. Benham's prefatory memoir to the Globe Edition of Cowper's Poems.

Mr. Goldwin Smith mentions, as he could hardly fall to do, his acknowledgments to this previous memoir, but he has not found a word of praise for his predecessor. We cannot wonder at his reticence in recommending Mr. Benham's essay, for, having carefully compared them throughout, we find not one page in the later biography which is an improvement on the earlier; and indeed, to all who possess the Globe Edition of Cowper, this new Life by Mr. Goldwin Smith is a mere encumbrance."—Sat. Rev., xlix, 833.

Mr. Goldwin Smith has treated Cowper too little as a character, too little as a letter-writer, too little as a man, and too much as a poet."—Spectator, liii. 561.

"The book is a very successful attempt to present a comprehensive picture, drawn both from the experience of the author and from that of previous Brazilian and foreign writers, of the present state of Brazil. It would, however, be improved by the entire suppression of the author's personal adventures, which are introduced only at such very long intervals, and in so disconnected a form, that they fail to be interesting. . . . "The reader will, no doubt, readily detect, alike in substance and rhythm, certain echoes and reminiscences of what is familiar; he will perceive a manifest sympathy with the genius of Tennyson and Browning, showing itself in the general tone and in particular tricks of phrase; but he will become aware also that he is in communication with a richly-endowed mind, sensitive to original impressions, and capable of reproducing them in felicitous and resonant words. Thus the volume is both admirable and disappointing. . . . It has genuine thought, creative imagination, and lyrical sweetness, though sometimes the thought is only surface-deep, the imagination is wanting in vivid completeness, and the reader stumbles over careless and clumps lines."—Spectator., xiv. 533.

"A work of unique importance in itself, and in relation to the controversies of the time in which we live. . . For the first time the English reader has in his hands a competent account of the critical method, with some of the most marked results which flow from its application to the literature of the Old Testament. . . It is a book distinguished by marked ability, by profound learning, by clearness of style and incisiveness of thought."—Spectator, liv. 674.

"The first successful attempt to bring the full power of Semitic philology to bear upon this highly interesting but difficult question was made by Prof. Robertson Smith in a collection of facts about female kinship and totemism which appeared under the title of 'Animal Worship and Animal Tribes among the Arabs and in the Old Testament' in the ninth volume of the 'Journal of Philology.

... The honour of finally solving the problem was reserved to the same scholar who had given the first impulse to the study of old Semitic society, and this solution—which future research may modify in secondary points, but will scarcely alter in its chief heads—is contained in the present book. . . It is a masterpiece of sound reasoning, and no link in the chain of argument betrays the slightest sign of weakness."—Ath., No. 3064.

Spedding, James, [ante, vol. ii., add.,] 1808-1881,
b. at Mirehouse, near Bassenthwaite, Cumberland; graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1831, and was afterwards elected an honorary Fellow of that college. At Cambridge he was a contemporary and intimate friend of Alfred Tennyson and Edward Fitzgerald, and he was subsequently well acquainted with Carlyle, Thackeray, and other men of note; but his own life was a very quiet and uneventful one, being almost wholly de-voted to study and research in connection with the work by which his name will be permanently remembered. In the preparation of his edition of Bacon's Works he had, as is mentioned ante, vol. ii., the assistance of R. L. Ellis and D. D. Heath; but by far the greater por-Lefts and D. D. Heath; out by hir the greater portion of the labor was executed by himself. 1. Companion to the Railway Edition of Lord Campbell's Life of Bacon. By the Railway Reader. Lon., 1853. 2. (Ed.) "The thoroughness, the infinite pains, the ability, with which Mr. Spedding has performed the task to which he may be said to have devoted his life, ought to excite the admiration of all students, and the shame of a good many. But we cannot help wishing that one who knows so much about his subject had found a less cumbrous mode of putting the results of his knowledge before us. A work which probably he could do better than any one else, a fit biography of Bacon, has, after all this, still to be done."—Sat. Rev., xxix. 219.

"It is not merely that his great contribution to English history has no rival for accuracy of judgment, and for industry carried to the extreme point; or that he has taught us to know in his true character one of the greatest statesmen of a land fertile in statesmanship. His book is more than a history, more than a biography. It is a moral school, teaching historical writers to combat the sin which most easily besets them, the tendency to put their own interpretation upon doubtful facts, and their own thoughts into the minds of men of other ages."—Samuel R. "It is to be regretted that in Mr. Spedding's lifetime this work was only privately printed for the use of a few friends. . . The matter, and much of the language, were distributed through the several volumes of his 'Letters and Life of Bacon,' where the continuous and cumulative power of the argument is frittered away by the long and frequent breaks between its different parts. In its original shape, which is now made public for the first time, 'Evenings with a Reviewer' is a full and minute examination of Macaulay's essay on Bacon. And never was a showy and hollow display of rhetorical criticism more thoroughly, patiently, and pitilessly dissected by a true critic."—Sal. Rev., Iliii. 508.

Spencer, Herbert, [ante, vol. ii., add.,] b. 1820, at Derby, Eng.; was educated by his father, a teacher in that town, and by his uncle, Rev. Thomas Spencer. He was articled to a civil engineer in 1837, but gave up the profession eight years later, having in the mean time contributed to the Civil Engineer's and Architect's Journal. He then settled in London, where he was sub-editor of the Economist 1848-53, and a contributor to the Westminster Review and Edinburgh Review. Spencer's publication of evolutionary views antedated that of Darwin's book, and his life has been largely devoted to the development of his System of Synthetic Philosophy, (the programme of which was issued in 1860,) which is an endeavor to carry into the whole re-gion of phenomena the laws of evolution as set forth in his two essays of 1857. In 1882 he paid a visit to the United States. He has been a frequent contributor to leading periodicals, chiefly of articles in delence of his philosophical system against the Duke of Argyll and other assailants. 1. The Principles of Psychology, Lon., 1870-72, 2 vols. 8vo; new ed., 1881. (This is an enlarged edition, with a new arrangement of the matter, of the work with the same title mentioned ante, vol. ii.)

"We do not think this volume will be found equal to its predecessors in general importance and interest. The proportion of critical and controversial matter is greater than we should have liked to see; for this is not the kind of writing in which Mr. Spencer excels, and the time and energy spent by him in replying to criticisms appear to us, even when the replies are successful, to be so much lost from the stock available for his principal work. There is no final answer to hostile criticism of a great work but the permanence of the work itself. However, Mr. Spencer has given us good specimens of his constructive genius in the essays on Animal Worship and on Laws in General."—Sal. Rev., xxxviii. 20.

5. The Principles of Sociology: vol. i., Lon., 1877, 8vo: 3d ed., 1885.

"The ground covered by Mr. Spencer's undertaking is large and varied; in part it is unoccupied, or nearly so. But the most striking chapters in this volume, though perhaps not the most important in the general plan, are those where Mr. Spencer's work comes into contact, sometimes into collision, with that of other inquirers, who have gone before him in special departments of the history of culture and beliefs. The book contains indeed a series of challenges, some more explicit than others, but all sufficiently definite, which we may expect to see taken up in due course by those whom they principally concern."—Sol. Rev., xiiil. 170.

9. The Man rersus the State, Lon., 1884, 8vo.

"According to Mr. Herbert Spencer, the true Liberal doctrine is 'greater freedom from restraint, particularly in political institutions.' . . . Mr. Spencer would restrict the functions of the State to those of the police magistrate and policeman."—Spectator, iyili. 421.

"As an analysis of a temporary tendency, Mr. Herbert Spencer's book is very interesting; but we are far from thinking it a complete or adequate treatment of the subject."—Nation, xil. 39.

10. Ecclesiastical Institutions: being Part VI. of the Principles of Sociology, (vol. ii., Part III.,) Lon., 1885, 8vo.

"He always writes didactically: he expounds his opinion on some subject and then proceeds to illustrate it by facts drawn from any race or age: for such purposes of illustration one traveller's tale answers as well as another. But when these illustrations have served to make clear what Mr. Spencer's opinion is, the reader is still at a loss to understand how it is proved."—Ath., No. 3045.

General Criticism:

GENERAL CRITICISM:

"Possessing as he does an acquaintance with almost all branches of physical science, together with a singular quickness in the detection of analogies, and much analytic power, he has the good fortune to be also able to manifest his wealth of thought by a corresponding richness of diction, his style being clear and forcible, abounding in pic-

Spurgeon, Rev. Charles Haddon, [ante, vol. ii., add.] The popularity of Mr. Spurgeon as a preacher has suffered no diminution, though his health in recent years has been somewhat impaired. The annual publication of the Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, containing the reports of his sermons, has gone on without interruption, reaching its thirty-third volume in 1888, with a circulation of 25,000 or more. Besides a Pastors' College, schools, almshouses, and an orphanage have been founded in connection with the tabernacle, endowed in part with the proceeds of two testimonials, amounting to about £12,000, which were presented to Mr. Spurgeon on the occasion of his "silver wedding," in 1879, and of his fiftieth birthday, in 1884. embodying the scientific results of two years spent in arduous exploration, it is at the same time a diary of picturesque travel in a strange and most interesting land."

"The Dean has given us exquisite sketches of the Celtic and Church period, most finished dramatic episodes of Covenanting story, has preached most eloquent lessons on charity, especially in the sermon, prefixed to the lectures, which was delivered in the time-honoured church of Old Greyfriars, in Edinburgh, on the 'Eleventh Commandment.' That ye love one another.' But as it seems to us, and as it has seemed to some of his greatest admirers in the North, he has simply postponed indefinitely the great moral result which might have flowed from his lectures by his ignoring first of all, the intense belief of the Scotch people in their ecclesiastical independence; and, secondly, by his glorification of a questionable generation—the world-famous 'Moderates'—as representatives in their day of the deepest worth of Scotch churchmen."—Spectator, xlv. 694.

"It will introduce many to a better knowledge of Judaism, and prompt them to study it. Dr. Stanley has shown his ability to transfuse life into the past of Israel. If he stands in a middle path between advanced scholars and general readers, and glosses over things unpleasant to the average English mind; if he weaves the historical and legendary together into a web of pleasing texture, without a hint of separation, he cannot be blamed for standing where he may be more useful than the fearless inquirer who speaks out, with blunt honesty, what he thinks about the sacred records, and suffers accordingly."—Ath., No. 2550.

If a graceful and picturesque style were alone sufficient "If a graceful and picturesque style were alone sufficient to make a good historian, the Dean of Westminster would have few rivals. But the business of the historian is, after all, to write history; and Dean Stanley's last volume, judged by that test, must be pronounced a failure. Most of it, indeed, is nothing more than Ewald done into beautiful English."—Sat. Rev., xliv. 51.

Stanley, Henry Morton, whose name was originally John Rowlands, b. 1840, near Denbigh, Wales, at the age of fifteen sailed as a cabin-boy to New Orleans, where he was adopted by a merchant named Stanley. He enlisted in the Confederate army in the civil war, was taken prisoner, and afterwards joined the Federal service. In 1867 he went with the British army to Abyssinia as correspondent of the New York Herald. In 1870 he was sent by the same paper to Africa in search of Livingstone, whom he found in November, 1871, at Ujiji, on Lake Tanganyika. In 1874 he was again sent to Africa by the New York Herald and the London Daily Telegraph, made an exploration of Lakes Albert and Victoria Nyanza, and returned in 1878. In 1879 he undertook an expedition, fitted out by the King | 1887, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

of the Belgians, on behalf of the African International Association, which resulted in the establishment of trading-stations along the Congo, and the establishment, in 1884, of the Congo Free State. In 1887 he set out on an expedition organized for the relief of Emin Pasha, and, having accomplished this purpose, returned to Europe in 1890, and was received with extruordinary demonstrations of welcome and applause in Italy, Belgium, and England. As a discoverer Stanley is considered to rank after Livingstone, but he has traversed a larger portion of the African Continent than any former explorer, and contributed in a greater degree to the diffusion of information in regard to the interior and the furtherance of projects for the extension of commerce and civilization. 1. including an Account of Four Months' Residence with Dr. Livingstone. Map and Illust. Lon. and N. York, 1872, 8vo; new ed., 1874.

"In spite of all its defects, it is incomparably more lively than most books of African travel... The narrative naturally falls into three parts. First, there is Mr. Stanley's journey from the coast to the charming town of Unyanyembe; ... secondly, there are adventures which beiell Mr. Stanley in forcing his way past hostile tribes from Unyanyembe to Ujiji; and thirdly, there is the residence with Dr. Livingstone, and the return to the coast... The American people have a reputation for turning their hands to anything with strange versatility and success, and certainly Mr. Stanley seems in this respect to be an excellent specimen of the race."—Sal. Rev., xxiv. 635.

"Mr. Stanley's book unquestionably takes rank with those of Burton, Grant. Speke, and all other travellers in the same district of Africa, in so far as it is a truthful and trustworthy account of what he saw, heard, and did. In scientific attainments he was inferior to all his predecessors, in descriptive power as well, though his narrative is anything but dry reading, and contains many excellent descriptions of scenery."—Nation, xvi. 118.

"It is impossible not to regard him as one of the extraordinary men of our time. . . . We are impressed here, as in his How I Found Livingstone, with his humane regard for inferior beings, and with his uniform attempt to deal with them as if they recognized the same standards and were actuated by the same motives with himself."—Nation. xxvii. 179. 5. The Congo and the Founding of its Free State: a Story of Work and Exploration. Maps and Illust. Lon. and N. York, 1885, 2 vols. 8vo.

"In some respects the book is disappointing. The Congo is not an interesting river. The people who live on its banks are savages, pure and simple, with little individuality. It requires, therefore, more literary skill than the author possesses to make his record of the work of dragging wagons, of tedious negotiations, of founding stations, and exploring rivers with low, monotonous banks and water as black as ink, entertaining to the general reader."

"It is not only one of the chief works of the year, but is likely to remain a standard authority on Africa for at least a generation to come."—Nat. Kev., 1x. 25.

"Mr. Stanley may fairly boast of having given to the world two of the most remarkable books of travel and adventure. . . And this second work is in every respect by far the more interesting.—the more creditable to its author, if it be permissible to use such an expression. Whilst the geographer cannot afford to neglect it, it appeals to wider sympathies. It will be read with avidity by that large and ever-increasing number of persons who look upon the regeneration of Africa as a thing not only desirable, but also possible; it appeals to the merchants and manufacturers to whom Africa, abounding in natural wealth and teeming with people. is a promising field for their enterprise."—Ath., No. 3004.

"Mr. Statham was once minister of a Scotch congregation who had originally gathered round an ex-Congregational minister for whom Mr. Huxley delivered one of the best of his well-known lay sermons. . . This was, no doubt, a very instructive experience: and it has led the author, who apparently learnt to think from Mr. Spencer and to write from Mr. Arnold, to some very curious and not unimportant conclusions. The chief of them is that the hope of England is to be found in a combination of Erastianism and Ritualism, to be worked by a learned clergy, who are to be paid out of the Consolidated Fund, to be promoted by seniority in the country parishes, by merit in towns and are to act as professors of daily conduct. . . . It is in the negative part of his book that Mr. Statham himself succeeds best. The chapter on 'The Danger of Free Thought' is really quite unanswerable."—G. A. Simcox: Acad., xxvi. 88.

"As a hand-book to the poetic literature of England during the last and present generations, Mr. Stedman's volume is commendable and serviceable. . . . As a 'philosophical critic,' Mr. Stedman shows himself more receptive and impressible than discriminating; he exhibits facility rather than force of mind. and more fluency of expression than body of thought or keenness of discernment."—Nation, xxii. 117.

"He may not have the large wisdom, or the keen insight and delicate touch, which accompany literary judgment of the highest kind, and make even criticism almost creative, and which are seldom found apart from considerable powers of original production. But he is faithful, studious, and discerning; of a sane and reasonable temper, and in the main a judicial one; his judgment is disciplined and exercised, and his decisions, even when one cannot agree with them, are based on intelligible grounds."—Sut. "If Mr. Stephen were a professed defender of established institutions, his criticisms of liberty, equality, and fraternity might perhaps be equally forcible, but they would be much less novel... He avows himself a utilitarian and a disciple of Locke, of Bentham, and to a certain extent of Mr. Mill."—Sat. Rev., xxxv. 517.

Law of England, Lon., 1883, 3 vols. 8vo.

"It is a history of the English criminal law, and a very good history, well told, well proportioned, lively, yet discreet and dignified. But it is also very much more. It is full of piquant discertations on matters of current interest.

We find a sketch of the criminal law of Rome, an elaborate comparison of the merits of the English and French methods of criminal procedure, a subtle disquisition on insanity, and a collection of typical English and French trials.

Delightful and instructive from one end to the other."—Sal. Rev., 1v. 310.

Stephen, Leslie, [ante, vol. ii., add.,] b. 1832, at Kensington, London; son of the late Sir James Stephen, q. r., ante, vol. ii.,) and brother of Sir James Fitzjames Stephen, supra; was educated at Eton, at King's College, London, and at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, of which he was for some years Fellow and tutor. He was editor of the Cornhill Magazine 1871-82, and resigned that post in order to become editor of the Dictionary of National in order to become editor of the Dictionary of National Biography. In 1883 he became lecturer on English literature at Cambridge, but he held that office for only one year. He married Harriet Marion, younger daughter of W. M. Thackeray, who died in 1875. Mr. Stephen has contributed to the Saturday Review and other periodicals. 1. The Play-Ground of Europe. Illust. Lon., 1871, p. 8vo. (Consists of articles describing Alpine

"Good taste, sound judgment, competent knowledge, and an occasional vivacity of expression,—these literary virtues are evident throughout. . . . On the other hand, we do not find in this work the subtle criticism, the fine imagination, or the perfect beauty of utterance, which so attract us in some volumes of biographical and literary criticism that we are drawn towards them again and again."—Spectator, xlvii. 857.

"His point of view is that of a playfully truculent agnostic, who has had the great advantage, for the purpose of this controversy, of having been trained (as the reader will infer) in a school of cultivated religious belief. . . .

The lack of warmth, which makes Mr. Stephen less than satisfactory as a critic in his longer studies, makes itself still more felt in his rapid sketches of writers in groups. But we know of no book of the kind which contains so much information or so much keen and lively criticism of the same order."—Spectator, liv. 573.

"Mag Stophon leaves metanhysics in the strict sense

"Mr. Stephen leaves metaphysics in the strict sense almost entirely on one side, and endeavours to show by example that a rational and fairly sufficient ethical doctrine may be formed without prejudice to ultimate philosophical questions, without reliance on any particular solution of them, and indeed without deciding whether they are soluble or not. Our opinion is that he has succeeded."

8. Swift, (" English Men of Letters,") Lon., 1882, p.

"Mr. Leslie Stephen is not exactly the writer whom a lover of Swift would choose for the purpose. His acquaint-ance with the period is indeed unquestionable; and his general faculty of literary appreciation is of a high order. But it is not so unquestionable whether Mr. Stephen is highly qualified to appreciate humour, especially humour of so exceptional a kind as Swift's. As a biographic sketch the book deserves hardly anything but praise."—Sat. Rev., liv. 443.

9. (Ed.) The Works of Henry Fielding: with a Biographical Essay. Illust. Lon., 1882, 10 vols. r. 8vo.

"The editing of the new Fielding is by no means so scholarly as was to be desired. The arrangement is entirely arbitrary: the text, save that in 'Amelia' a few suppressed passages have been reprinted, appears to be mainly that of Arthur Murphy: of annotations and explanations, which are absolutely indispensable to a correct and complete understanding of Fielding, and which, judiciously supplied, would have gone far to make the edition final, there is not one in all the ten volumes. . . Of Mr. Stephen's introductory essay we can speak in terms of almost unqualified approval. . . It may, without exaggeration, be described as the best and soundest estimate of Fielding that has yet appeared."—Ath., No. 2871.

"It is a very incomplete 'life' in the sense of a biography or memoir. . . . It is rather a series of essays than of personal memoirs. . . . Mr. Stephen's interesting volume leaves room for yet another, which should be equal to it in value, showing how, in the more private relations of his life, Fawcett maintained the same high qualities which adorned his public career."—Alh., No. 3031.

been one written as well as edited by Mr. Leslie Stephen. In every volume of this work... he evinces his decisive superiority among English biographers. All the essential facts are to be found accurately set forth in his articles: his criticisms, both of work and character, are just, and, at the same time, merciful; his style never loses its interest and individuality, even when facts are most crowded; and his irrepressible humour oozes up through the dry sands of bibliography. The ideal being unattainable, we acknowledge with gratitude that as near an approach to it as was possible has been made. There are great inequalities in the articles; the treatment of one or two subjects is throughout not strong, it it cannot be called positively weak; but by far the larger part is adequate; and we see more and more clearly as the work goes on the controlling hand of the editor in the suppression of all that is tawdry, affected, and pretentious. The work, it may be said at once, more than justifies the highest expectations that have been formed of it, and is a permanent and noble contribution to the literature of England."—W. ROBERTSON NICOLL: Acad., xxx. 65.

"The editor and his staff have maintained a remarkable eveniness of execution and justness of proportion, and above all a spirit of simple truthfulness which becomes the more impressive the more one makes himself acquainted with the contents. Doubtless we owe a great deal of this excellence to Mr. Stephen himself, in whom these literary and moral qualities are conspicuous, and whose articles (collectively the best in the Dictionary) are models for all his colaborers."—Nation, xlvi. 328.

"The thoroughness of the work is such that the Dictionary has become an indispensable book of reference, and when it is completed its influence will be strongly felt on the scholarship of the next generation... It is not a series of suggestive monographs, but a mass of trustworthy information, drawn from original sources, which the student needs and which Mr. Stephen has endeavoured to supply."—English Historical Review, v. 783.

Admirable as the industry is that Mr. Stephens displays in this volume, one is tempted to wish that he had read less and spent more time in trying to picture to himself and his readers the events with which he deals, for his work seems as if it had had all life crushed out of it by the multitude of books he has consulted. . . . "The volume before us has a special claim to attention, as giving what to all intents and purposes must be considered as Mary's own account of herself during that period of her life in which her actions are most canvassed... This remarkable fragment has existed for nearly three centuries in what was almost all along the best known and the most accessible collection of MSS, in the whole kingdom, namely, the Cottonian Library, and no one till within the last few years took the trouble to decipher it and tell the world what was in it."—Ath., No. 2895.

A. Brunet-Debaines, Vignettes, &c., Lon., 1878, 101.; new ed., 1888, p. 8vo.

"Mr. Stevenson can see Edinburgh as she is; he seems to have suffered from the adorers of Burns, and even appears to take a mischlevous pleasure in telling his countrymen the result of a dispassionate inspection of their capital... Our quotations... make it needless to say anything about his style. It speaks for itself; its capitivating and irritating; it keeps the attention awake; it sketches a picture; in two words, it is never commonlace; it retains an accent of the quaintness of a time of leisure."—Sad. a. Travels with a Donkey in the Cevennes, Lon., 1879, p. 8vo; 3d ed., 1883.

"It would be doing Mr. Stevenson a great injustice to pretend that he sets the bare facts of this journey before us as of any value. . . . The merit of his tale is in the telling, and we must read the book slowly, for it is on account of its style that it merits our attention. . . . His writing is as elegant as ever, but it is more natural, and the phrases of humour and the parentheses of fine reflection no longer seem put in with any art; they have grown with the growth of the narrative. There is the same strong sympathy with humanity, the same power to read the 'red-leaved and confused book of the heart,' the same happy flight of quaint and original fun; but there is less egotism, and the view of natural life is sweeter and healthier. It is remarkable that on so slight a thread so many jewels of thought and fancy can be hung; for the thread, we must confess, is exceedingly slight."—Sal. Rev., xlvii. 776.

"Regarding . . . these essays as elaborate studies in the literary art, . . . one cannot be deaf to the praises which his refined and flexible style has so fully deserved, and which may here be endorsed without repetition. The many instances of strained metaphor, forced illustration, and obscure extravagance which we might quote are due not to defects of style, but to barrenness of matter."

Svo.

"Mr. Stevenson is not seen at his best in this volume.
Of course his 'studies' are elegantly written and pleasant to read; but criticism is hardly his forte. The turn of his mind is distinctly subjective; and he is certainly happier when he is telling his readers how the immediate objects of sense affect him than when he is trying to estimate other people who have in their own way done the same."

waymen as if these venerable objects of worship had not been superseded long ago by mercantile heroes and dollarcoining newsboys. If it is not absolutely incumbent upon readers to decide beforehand and forever the question between realism and romance; if it be permitted to rejoice heartily in the truest phase and intention of each, to wave a welcome to the van of either processon and escape the rabble at its end, then let us enjoy without odorous comparisons our Stevensonian romance, and rest satisfied that invention has its truths and falsehoods as well as fact."—Sopina Kiek: Attantic Monthly, 1x. 747.

"Before all things he is a writer with a style,—a model with a complexity of curious and picturesque garments. It is by the cut and color of this rich and becoming frippery—I use the term endearingly, as a painter might—that he arrests the eye and solicits the brush. That is, frankly, half the charm he has for us, that he wears a dress and wears it with courage, with a certain cock of the hat and tinkle of the supererogatory sword; or, in other words, that he is curious of expression, and regards the literary form not simply as a code of signals, but as the key-board of a piano and as so much plastic material. . . Much as he cares for his phrase, he cares more for life, and for a certain transcendently lovable part of it. . . The part of life that he cares most for is youth, and the direct expression of the love of youth is the beginning and the end of his message. His appreciation of this delightful period amounts to a passion; and a passion, in the age in which we live, strikes us, on the whole, as a sufficient philosophy. . . . Mingled with his almost equal love of a literary surface it represents a real originality."—HENRY JAMES: The Century Magazine, xxxv. (xiii.) 869.

in Edinburgh, and educated at the universities of St. Andrews and Edinburgh; was superintendent of Kew Observatory 1859-71, and added to that office in 1867 that of secretary of the Government Metcorological Committee, which he resigned in 1869. In 1870 he was appointed professor of natural philosophy at Owens College, Manchester. In 1868 he received from the Royal Society the Rumford medal for his discovery of the law of the equality of the absorptive and radiative powers of bodies. He was president of the Society for Psychical of bodies. He was president of the Society for Psychical Research, and of the Physical Society of London, and contributed papers to the Transactions of the Royal Society. 1. with Questions, 1878, 18mo. 4. The Conservation of Energy: being an Elementary Treatise on Energy and its Laws, Lon., 1873, p. 8vo.

"The first two chapters are devoted to the consideration of mechanical energy and its change into heat... The remaining forms of energy are then explained, and the law of its conservation is stated, and its operation traced through all varieties of transmutations. An historical sketch of the progress of the science, and an examination of Professor Thomson's correlative theory of the Dissipation of Energy, follow; and the work concludes with a chapter on the Position of Life. .. The style is all that it should be, it is difficult to understand how so much information can be contained in so few words."—Sat. Rev., xxxvii. 116.

much padding, serving simply to fill up Mr. Stigand's two large volumes."—Sal. Rev., xll. 403.
